"He Shall Give His Angels Charge"

Across the Narrow foot-bridge the little child may tread;
Unseen, by God's own angel its fearless feet are led;
No harm shall touch a single hair of that fair, golden head.

Across the mighty chasms and yawning gulfs of Time,
With noiseless tread the passing years in vast procession climb,
And, one by one, God's angel keeps for each a watch sublime.—Margaret E. Sangster

Questions of the Week

1. What investment of capital do the combined higher institutions of learning in the more prominent nations represent, respectively?

No answers have been received. Trustworthy statistics on this subject are not as readily accessible as many other details relating to universities, colleges, art schools and other institutions of higher education. THE MAIL-BAG will start an investigation on the subject by communication with authorities far and near, and present results at a later date.—EDITOR.

2. Is it wiser to relieve the destitute poor ourselves or to do so through the medium of an organized charity?

While we would not underestimate the value of work done by organized charities, and while it is true that so many of the destitute could not be helped without systematic organized effort, and that many cases of imposition are prevented by organized charity, yet I am convinced by personal experience among the poorer classes, that whenever it is possible to come into personal contact with them, the results are better. Many of the poor look upon the workers for charitable organizations as public benefactors, and not as personal friends; while one who gives personal sympathy and shows real interest in them may often find opportunity to feed the Bread of Life to a lost soul while giving of his bread to a famishing body. MRS. A. E. LAKE.

Our correspondent might have added that Christ did his beneficent work personally. Other correspondents have favored organized charities on the ground that the early church ministered to its needy members through a board of deacons. This board of "men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and wisdom" can hardly be regarded even as the embryo of the modern charitable organizations. Not only is personal charity calculated to prove the greater blessing to worthy objects thereby reached, but it is a means of grace and blessing to the giver that organized charity cannot well be.—EDITOR.

3. Who may be considered the leading religious character of the nineteenth century?

If the answer to this question is to be decided by the impression made upon the religious life and activity of the century, the selection must be made from among the human originators of great religious movements. Before the century begun, Robert Raikes had already instituted his Sunday Schools, but as he did not die until 1811, and the closing decade of his life saw his great work deepening and widening, he is entitled to rank high in any list of nineteenth century religious characters. George Muller did more than any man to inculcate the grace of simple faith in God in the conduct of religious work. The great work of the Salvation Army, pursuing its way all over the world, makes William Booth prominent. The rapid growth and stupendous influence of the Christian Endeavor movement suggests the name of Francis E. Clark. The influence of D. L. Moody's evangelistic labor gives emphasis to the honored name of this distinguished worker. Robert Moffatt, David Livingstone, C. H. Spurgeon and many other names spring up in the mind, all among the mighty men of our King David. Probably the greatest influence for good upon the church and the world during the century has been that of William Carey. His labors were begun before the century opened, but for one-third of the present century they were carried on with results that only divine arithmetic can set forth, while as the father of modern missions he has set in operation the most remarkable accumulative religious movement of the century. S. T. MILLER.

4. Since the beginning of the Christian era, who lived the longest?

Several instances of longevity are from time to time quoted, but they are not sufficiently well authenticated to be considered trustworthy. Even the case of Thomas Parr, of Shropshire, England, who is reported to have lived 152 years, and then died from overeating at the king's table, can hardly be said to be absolutely established. In June, 1888, a man named Rives was living in Tarbes, France, whose certificate of baptism showed that he was then 118 years old. Unwarranted manipulation with records and errors in the same, besides clumsy ways of chiselling dates on tombstones or entering them on records, have started many delusive claims to remarkable longevity. There have been numerous well-authenticated cases in the United States and Great Britain of persons who have closely approached 110 years. L. T. LESTER.

5. Which is the most deserving of the foreign mission fields at the present time, and why?

If need is to decide the question, parts of Africa, South America, the sealed kingdom of Tibet, the Philippine Islands and other portions of the world might be mentioned; but if the answer is to be based on success achieved, and the converts' appreciation of the Gospel and manifest interest in spreading it, China may well be pronounced the most deserving of the foreign mission fields at the present time. G. A. WHITTAKER.

6. Ought a Christian to insure his life, or to insure his premises against fire? Is such a course in violation of Christ's injunction, "Take therefore no thought for the morrow"?

Christ's command here quoted is a warning against anxious worry for to-morrow. Insurance against loss by fire is one means of lessening anxiety on that score, and an implicit carrying out of Christ's injunction. Life insurance as now provided, based as it is upon settled facts in regard to the average duration of life, subserves the same purpose, namely, the diminution of anxiety. This is a case wherein the old Arab injunction well illustrates one's duty, namely, "First tie thy camel, then trust Allah." Before, during and after all human precautions the Christian should trust God, none the less when he makes wise use of means, but all the more because he has so far as possible provided for his own household, as enjoined by St. Paul. Only by proper provision for the family can he escape the Apostle's charge of infidelity. L. A. MARSHALL.

7. Is there any well-authenticated instance of dreams coming true, or directing the mind and waking energies to any practical results?

The Bible has many such instances, and, apart from the Bible records, there are numerous well-authenticated instances both of dreams coming true and of their directing the mind to practical results. Coleridge claims to have dreamed his poem, "Kubla Khan." Upon awakening, he at once wrote down the lines. Tartini's "Devil's Sonata," was the inspiration of a dream. Condorcet reached in a dream the conclusion of a calculation that had baffled him when awake. Cæsar's wife dreamed that her husband fell bleeding across her knees, the night before his assassination. Elias Howe was much puzzled on the proper position of the eye in the needle of his sewing machine, but solved the problem in a dream.

A. WILSON.

8. Ought a man to contribute to the Lord's work when he is in debt, or should he first pay his creditors?

This question is best answered by two or three bald statements. The Lord is one of every man's creditors. A debtor should not rob man to pay God nor rob God to pay man. If I take money that should be paid to my grocer and ostentatiously give it to charity I am guilty of two sins, pride and theft. Ordinary business debts, for the discharge of which, in due course, a man has abundant assets, can never excuse him from giving a proper portion of his income to God. If a man is insolvent and as a tradesman owes for his stock of goods more than its value, he had better devote the proceeds of it to his earthly creditors and humbly ask the Heavenly Creditor to allow his claims to be deferred. The Bible bids us honor the Lord with the first-fruits of our increase. A strict application of that principle will never put an embargo on what honestly belongs to our fellow-men in order to pay what we owe to God. C. HOLT.

9. Is a Christian woman justified in wearing jewelry, other than her watch and wedding ring?

Two passages of Scripture touch explicitly on this subject. Judging from I. Peter 3:3, I would say that if a woman regards jewelry as her chief ornament, she is not justified in wearing it, because she then transgresses the rule laid down by the apostle. His teaching is that woman's true adornment is a meek and quiet spirit and not beautiful hair, ornamental jewelry or fine apparel. The words of Peter do not absolutely say, however, that a woman must not wear jewelry any more than she must not plait her hair or wear clothes. In I. Timothy 2:9 we have more positive declaration, as Paul distinctly says: "I will that women adorn themselves with modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with broidered (or plaited) hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array." A strictly literal conformation to Scripture would do away with much of the costly apparel now worn by Christian women. M. E. JACKSON.

10. Is there any real reason, physiological or religious, why cousins should not marry?

There are very weighty reasons, physiological and consequently moral, why those who are closely related by blood should not intermarry. Every family has peculiarities common to its members in their physical and mental make-up, and intermarriage cannot fail to emphasize their idiosyncrasies in the offspring; whereas, the matrimonial union of unrelated individuals affords better prospect of the neutralization of vicious tendencies in the one parent by the opposite tendencies in the other. The physical and mental decay among the members of the royal houses of Europe, from continued intermarriage, is frequently instanced, and medical literature fairly bristles with cases that prove conclusively the grave results of the violation, in this manner, of well known physiological laws. It is a universally recognized fact that among the lower animals "inbreeding" is disastrous, the stock quickly manifesting degeneracy. Under like circumstances, degeneracy is just as truly present in the highest animal, man; though he, with the advantage of the additional brain he possesses, may be able to hide the "faults" of his make-up from the eyes of the world, if these faults be not too gross. Man is mo responsible for the immortal souls he laur on the ocean of existence, that he give the very best possible residual fund on w to draw, in the contingencies to which may be exposed in this life.

East Africa in Sore Plight

Long Drought Causes a Wide-Spread Famine — Missionaries Write of Sorrowful Scenes . .

REV. F. W. KRIEGER

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is in receipt of a number of letters from missionaries in British East Africa, giving sorrowful accounts of the famine in that country. The native inhabitants belong to the great Bantu or Negroid race, and are agricultural and pastoral in their pursuits; and although they labor with the crude implements and after the primitive and desultory fashion characteristic of unenlightened races, they make a living out of the soil when conditions are favorable. But for three years the coast region has lacked sufficient rain; and similar conditions extending inland have now reduced the people to great destitution. The Church Missionary Society workers, who have several stations along the coast, are doing what they can for relief, and the British Government has given them some money to spend. In the interior something is being done by the British military officers, and the Africa Inland Mission is aiding to its utmost the starving multitude which gathers about it pleading for food.

In Mombasa, as the press of that city states, a meeting of representative citizens was recently convened by Major Souter, the officer commanding troops in that region, locally known as the "Chinese Gordon of East Africa," to discuss the situation and devise means of relief. In his report, Major Souter stated that fifty per cent. of Ukamba's 1,000,000 population have died of starvation; and that the proportion of such deaths in Mombasa Province is sixty per cent. Between Voi and Kikuyu, a distance of two hundred miles, 50,000 people have starved to death. To add to the horror of the situation, smallpox has been gaining headway in Mombasa. From Major Souter's audience many bags of grain and a generous sum of money were subscribed on the spot; and plans were formulated for bringing a knowledge of the condition of affairs to England's great-hearted Queen.

The following extracts from letters by Rev. William C. Bangert, from the Africa Inland Mission at Kangunda, to Mr. Hurlbut, President of the Philadelphia Missionary Council, give a more graphic picture of the situation than it is possible for the words of any but an eye-witness to convey:

"The famine has been doing its awful work so long and to such an extent that the natives seem to think nothing of ten or a dozen bodies lying about in their shambas (gardens). I sometimes fear that I am getting hardened to the awfulness of all this. Think of poking corpses out of trees, hearing them fall to the ground with a thud, and leaving them there for the hyenas and jackals to finish! Yet this procedure, as a sanitary measure, is forced upon us in the present dreadful situation. . . . A few days ago a baby died, and the father informed me with a smile, saying that now his wife could work good, and that there was one less to feed. . . . Shambas and paths are literally strewn with the dead, and scores are dying daily. I have heard of famine and read of famine, but never had the remotest dream of its awfulness till now. I write this while listening to the cry of starving children without the door. . . . More natives are swarming to the station, desiring to be taken on to work for the cup of rice a day, which we are giving out as long as we have it to give. This state of affairs is bound to grow worse until the next crops, and it is terrible to think of what must intervene. I have just come out of the valley with Kikure, and he pointed out a few bones and a scalp beside the path and said: 'There is Kavulia; he has died of hunger.' You will no doubt recall him to mind, as he was the mimic and fun-maker, and also the water and wood-carrier for your caravan coming up here. I mention this simply because you knew him, and not that the sight is a strange one or out of the ordinary. Go in any direction, and you are obliged to stumble over the dead. It is becoming so awful that I dread to walk about. . . . The natives, with few exceptions, are existing entirely on a little root berry, about the size of a pea, which they dig out of the ground. Where these are to be found you will daily see hundreds of pitiable specimens of humanity—skeletons of men, women and children, their mouths besmeared with dirt—squatting about, digging out these roots and eating them as soon as found is thus they manage to keep body and soul together for a time, but eventually tired give up the struggle and die. You noticed them getting thinner and thinner, gradually miss them entirely, and say to yourself: 'Another soul gone out to eternity.' My heart has been wrenched time and again by having to turn this one and that one away, and then learning of their bodies lying not far off, they having hovered about in the hope of yet being fed. . . . In view of the facts, I pray that the deliverance already commenced through funds given and sent out may not cease."

NATIVE APPLICANTS FOR FOOD SUPPLIES

Mrs. Knapp, another missionary, writes from Nairobi: "A number of c[illegible] assisted have been here this morning, and Moody nothing to give them. Besides, th[illegible] helped stealing everything in the garden. In a peas and beans are all gone, even such in we were trying to raise for seed. T[illegible]ble have cut all our bananas out of our [illegible] to orchard; we have not even one left. eak we cannot blame these poor people, co[illegible]sidering that they are heathen and starving to death. It is not pleasant to be in a tent here among a people mad with hunger. This morning the place swarmed with natives."

Mr. Hurlbut says: "If we can feed these natives now, they will gladly hear the Gospel. The opportunity for bringing Christ home to them is a royal one." The first news of this famine reached America in September, and photographs showing actual conditions in the afflicted district at present, are, of course, unattainable. The pictures and facts we present have been supplied through courtesy of Rev. W. P. Ray, Superintendent of the Christian Unity Association, Hawleyville, Conn.; and Rev. Charles Hurlbut, 926 North Broad street, Philadelphia, President of the Philadelphia Missionary Council, representing the Africa Inland Mission. This Mission, established some years ago, is about seven miles from Nairobi, the most important station on the Mombasa-Uganda railroad. There is an industrial training school in connection with it, and it has been doing much to improve the condition of the Kikuyus (as the natives are called), in a secular, as well as a spiritual sense. All inquiries or contributions sent to Dr. [illegible] but or Rev. Mr. Ray, will receive prompt attention. Rev. F. W. Krieger, Superintendent of the Christian Unity Evangelical and Industrial Mission in British East Africa, is pressing into service every possible measure of relief. The officials of the Government railroad are granting special reduction in transportation, and dealers on the coast are making wholesale rates for food. In Mombasa, Mr. Palmer, Superintendent of Inland Revenue and Conservancy, has saved many lives by his energy and devotion. After his business duties were performed, he would canvass the streets for grain, money, medicine and bandages.

.. A Tale Told ..

Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Psalms 90: 9, ... { We spend our years as a tale that is told

THE Israelites were forty years in the wilderness, and during thirty-eight years of the forty nothing is recorded of them; and, I suppose, no other emigrants had a duller or more uninteresting time than they had. So they telling stories—stories concerning selves or concerning others; stories at the brick-kilns of Egypt, where they had toiled in slavery; stories about how the waters of the Red Sea piled up into palisades at their crossing; story of the lantern hung in the heavens to guide them by night; story of ibises destroying the reptiles of the wilderness; stories of personal encounter. It must have been an awful thing to have had nothing to do for thirty-eight years, except to get lost every time they tried to escape from the wilderness. So they whiled away the time in story-telling. Indeed, there were persons whose one business was to narrate stories, and they were paid by such as they could pick up from the surrounding listeners. To such instances, the text refers when it says: "We spend our years as a tale that is told."

As this tremendous passage from the year 1899 to the year 1900, it will do us good to consider that our whole life is a story told—a good story or a bad story; a tragic story or a mirthful story; a wise story or a foolish story; a clean story or a filthy story; a story of success or a story of failure. "We spend our years as a tale that is told."

In the first place, I remark that every person's life is a very interesting story. My text does not depreciate "a tale that is told." We have all of us been entertained by the story-teller when snow-bound in the rail-train; or in the group on a winter's night in the farmhouse; or gathered around a blazing hearth with some sisters at the mountain inn. Indeed, it is a praiseworthy art to impersonate a good story well. If you doubt the practical and healthful and inspiring use of such a story, take down from the library Washington Irving's Tales of a Traveler, or Nathaniel Hawthorne's Twice Told Tales. But as interesting as any of these would be the story of many an obscure life, if the tale were as well told. Why do we all like biographies and autobiographies? Because they are stories of eminent human lives. But the story of the life of a backwoodsman, of a man who looks stupid, of one about whom I never heard a word, must be just as thrilling on a small scale, as on a large scale is a life of a Cyrus, or a Cæsar, or a Pizarro, or a Mark Antony, or a Charlemagne, or the late General Gordon, who was upon a parapet leading his soldiers with nothing but a stick in his hand, and his troops cried: "Gordon, come down; you will be killed." But he did not come down, and one of the soldiers said: "It is all right. He don't mind being killed. He is one of those blessed Christians."

If I get the confidence of that very man just come out of the backwoods can induce him to give the experiences of his life, he will tell you that which will make your blood curdle and your hair stand on end. That time when a panther disputed his pathway on the way home. That landslide, when the mountains seemed about to come down on his cabin. That accident to his household and no surgeon within fifteen miles. That long storm that shut them in, and the food was exhausted. That contest at his doorway with bandits, who thought there might be within something worth taking. That deathbed, with no one but himself to count the fluttering pulses.

As Oliver Cromwell on the anniversary of his greatest victory followed his darling daughter to the grave, so in the humblest and most unpretending life there has been a commingling of gladness and gloom, of triumph and despair. Nothing that David Garrick ever enacted at Drury Lane Theatre in the way of tragedy, or Charles Matthews ever played in Covent Garden in the way of comedy, excelled things which on a small scale have been seen in the life of obscure men and women. Many a profound and learned sermon has put the audience to sleep, while some man whose phraseology could not be parsed, and whose attire was cut and fitted and made up by plainest housewife, has told the story of his life in a way that melted the prayer-circle into tears as easily as a warm April sun dissolves the snow of the previous night.

Oh, yes, while "we spend our years as a tale that is told," it is an interesting story. It is the story of an immortal, and that makes it interesting. He is launched on an ocean of eternal years, in a voyage that will never terminate. He is striking the keynote of an anthem or a dirge that will never come to its last bar. That is what makes the devotional meetings of modern times so much more interesting than they used to be. They are filled not with discourses by laymen on the subject of justification and sanctification, which lay-discourses administer more to the facetious than to the edifying, but with stories of what God has done for the soul: How everything suddenly changed; how the promises became balsamic in times of laceration; how he was personally helped out, and helped up, and helped on! Nothing can stand before such a story of personal rescue, personal transformation, personal illumination. The mightiest and most skilful argument against Christianity collapses under the ungrammatical but sincere statement. The atheistic professor of natural philosophy goes down under the story of that backwoodsman's conversion.

All that elaborate persuasion of the old folks of the folly of giving up active life too soon means nothing as compared with the simple incident you may relate to them of the fact that Benjamin Franklin was governor of Pennsylvania at eighty-two years of age, and that Dandolo of Venice at ninety years of age, although his eyesight had been destroyed through being compelled by his enemies to look into a polished metal basin under the full blaze of the sun until totally blind; yet this sightless nonogenarian leading an army to the successful besiegement of Constantinople! When an old man hears of such incidents he puts aside his staff and ear-trumpet and starts anew.

The New Testament suggests the power of the "tale that is told." Christ was the most effective story-teller of all the ages. The parables are only tales well told. Matchless stories: That of the traveler cut up by the thieves and the Samaritan paying his board-bill at the tavern; that of the big dinner, to which the invited guests sent in fictitious regrets; that of the shepherd answering the bleat of the lost sheep, and all the rural neighbors that night helping him celebrate the fact that it was safe in the barnyard; that of the bad boy, reduced to the swines' trough, greeted home with such banqueting and jewelry that it stuffed the older son with jealousy and disgruntlement; that of the Pharisee full of braggadocio, and the publican smiting his breast with a stroke that brought down the heavens in commiseration; stories about leprosy, about paralysis, about catalepsy, about dropsy, about ophthalmia—stories that he so well told that they have rolled down to the present, and will roll down through the entire future.

The most of the Old Testament is made up of inspired anecdotes about Adam and Eve, about Jacob, about Esau, about Ahab, and Jezebel, about Jonah, about Daniel, about Deborah, about Vashti—about men and women of whom the story gave an accurate photograph long before human photography was born. Let all Christian workers, prayer-meeting talkers, Sunday School teachers, and preachers, know the power of that which my text calls the "tale that is told."

I heard Daniel Baker, the wonderful evangelist of his time, preach what I suppose was a great sermon, but I remember nothing of it except a story that he told, and that, I judge from the seeming effect, may that afternoon have brought hundreds into the kingdom of God. I heard Truman Osborne preach several sermons, but I remember nothing of what he said in public or private except a story that he told, and that was, among other things, the means of my salvation. The life-long work of John B. Gough, the greatest temperance reformer of all time, was the victory of anecdote, and who can ever forget his story of Joel Stratton touching him on the shoulder, or of Deacon Moses Grant at Hopkinton, or of the outcast woman, nicknamed "Hell Fire," but redeemed by the thought that she "was one of us?" Dwight L. Moody, the evangelist of world-wide fame and usefulness, now passed from the sphere of service on earth to the presence of his Lord, whom he served so faithfully, wielded the anecdote for God and heaven until all nations have been moved by it.

If you have had experiences of pardon and comfort and disenthrallment, tell of it. Tell it in the most pointed and dramatic way you can manage. Tell it soon, or you may never tell it at all. O, the power of "the tale that is told!"

In what way could the fact that infidelity will not help any one die well be so powerfully presented as by the incident concerning a man falling ill in Paris just after the death of Voltaire, when a professional nurse was called in and she asked. "Is the gentleman a Christian?" "Why do you ask that," said the messenger. The nurse replied: "I am the nurse who attended Voltaire in his last illness, and for all the wealth of Europe I would never see another infidel die." What discourse in its moral and spiritual effect could equal a tale like that?

You might argue upon the fact that those fallen are our brothers and sisters, but could we impress any one with such a truth so well as by the scene near Victoria Park, London, where men were digging a deep drain, and the shoring gave way and a great pile of earth fell upon the workmen. A man stood there with his hands in his pockets, looking at those who were trying to shovel away the earth from those who were buried, but when someone said to the spectator: "Bill, your brother is down there," then the spectator threw off his coat and went to work with an agony of earnestness to fetch up his brother. What course of argument could so well as that incident set forth that when we toil for the salvation of a soul it is a brother whom we are trying to save?

A second reading of my text reminds me that life is not only a story told, but that it is a brief story. A long narrative stretched out indefinitely loses its interest. It is generally the story that takes only a minute or half a minute to rehearse that arrests the attention. And that gives additional interest to the story of our life. It is a short story. Subtract from our life all the hours of necessary sleep, all the hours of incapacity through fatigue or illness, all the hours of childhood and youth before we get fairly to work, and you have abbreviated the story of life so much that you can appreciate the Psalmist's remark, when he says, "Thou hast made my days as a hand's breadth," and can appreciate the Apostle James' expression, when he compares life to "a vapor that appeareth for a little season, and then vanishes away."

It does not take long to tell all the vicissitudes of life—the gladness and the griefs, the arrivals and the departures, the successes and the failures, the victories and the defeats, the ups and the downs. The longer we live the shorter the years. We hardly get over the bewildering fatigue of selecting gifts for children and friends and see that the presents get off in time to arrive on the appropriate day, than we see another advancing group of holidays.

Every century is a big wheel of years, which makes a hundred revolutions and breaks down. Every year is a big wheel of months, and makes twelve revolutions and then ceases. Geologists and theologians go into elaborations of guesses as to how long the world will probably last; how long before the volcanic forces will explode it, or meteoric stroke demolish it, or the cold of a long winter freeze out its population, or the fires of a last conflagration burn it. That is all very well, but so far as the present population of the earth is concerned, the world will last but a little longer. We begin life with a cry and end it with a groan, and the cry and the groan are not far apart. Life, Job says, is like the flight of a weaver's shuttle, or, as David intimates in my text, a story quickly told, and laughed at and gone, and displaced by another story, as a "tale that is told."

I have to say that if life is so short we have not much of it to waste. In all our engagements ten o'clock ought to be ten o'clock, and three o'clock three o'clock, and eight o'clock eight o'clock. I will not waste your time, and you must not waste my time. Just reproof was that which Mrs. Washington, the wife of the first President, gave James Peale, the great painter. His daughter says: "My father had an engagement to paint a miniature of Mrs. Washington in Philadelphia, the General being then out of town. He was obliged to go to her house, and the appointment for a sitting was arranged at seven o'clock in the morning. My father arrived at the house, and taking out his watch he found he was exactly on time. A thought then struck him that possibly it might be early to disturb a lady, and he decided to give ten minutes' grace before knocking at the door. He accordingly walked the pavement, and at the end of ten minutes pulled out his watch and rang the bell. He was ushered into the parlor, and Mrs. Washington, accosting him, drew out her watch and said she had given her orders for the day, had heard her daughter take her lesson on the harpsichord, and had read all the morning papers, and after all this had been waiting for him ten minutes."

My friends, as our life is short, punctuality is one of the important virtues, and lack of punctuality one of the worst of crimes. How many who know nothing of punctuality! They arrive at the depot five minutes after the train is gone. They get to the wharf in time to see that the steamer has swung five hundred yards from the dock. They are late at church, and annoy all who have promptly taken their places, the late-comers not being as good as a Christian woman who, when asked how she could always be so early at church, replied: "It is part of my religion not to disturb the religion of others." The tardy ones mentioned are apt to speak the word of counsel when it is too late. They are resolved to repent at some time in the future, but when they come up "the door is shut." They resolve to save a soul when it is already ruined.

But short as time is, it is long enough if we rightly employ it. The trouble is we waste so much time we cannot catch up. Some of us have been chasing time we lost at twenty years of age, or thirty years of age, or forty years of age, and if we lived two hundred and fifty years we could never overtake it. Joseph, a poor apprentice, every morning passed a certain store as the church clock struck six, at the moment when the merchant took down his shutters, each of them saying "Good morning, sir," and nothing else. What was Joseph's surprise to find that the merchant had suddenly died and left him his store and business. That is not the only instance where a man has made a fortune by punctuality. The poet's verse reads,

> Time flies away fast,
> The while we never remember.
> How soon our life here
> Grows old with the year
> That dies with the next December.

A third reading of my text reminds me that life is not only a story told, but a story listened to. There is nothing more vexatious to any one than to tell a story when people are not attending. They may be whispering on some other subject, or they are preoccupied. One cannot tell a story effectually unless there are good listeners. Well, that which in my text is called the "tale that is told" has plenty of listeners. There is no such thing as solitude, no such thing as being alone. God listens, and the air is full of spiritual intelligences all listening, and the world listens to the story of our life, some hoping it will be successful, others hoping it will be a failure.

We talk about public life and private fe, but there is no private life. The ory of our life, however insignificant it ay seem to be, will win the applause or ss of a great multitude that no man can umber. As a "tale that is told" among dmirers or antagonists, celestials or ndemoniacs, the universe is full of stening ears as well as of gleaming eyes. f we say or do the right thing, that is nown. If we say or do the wrong thing, hat is known. I suppose the population f the intelligences in the air is more umerous than the population of intelli- ences on the earth. O, that the story f our life might be fit for such an audi- nce in such an auditorium! God grant hat wisdom and fidelity and earnestness ay characterize the "tale that is told."

Ay! all the world will yet listen to, nd be redeemed by, a "tale that is told." Ve are all telling it, each in his own way -some by voice, some by pen, some by rtist's pencil, some by harp, and some y song; mother telling it to child, eacher telling it to Sabbath class, re- ormer telling it to outcast, preacher tell- ng it to assemblage. The story of the oveliest of heaven coming down to this carred and blasted island of a world. Mightiest tale ever told! and keep on elling it until the last sorrow is assuaged, nd the last animosity is squelched, and he last desert is white with the lily, and golden with the cowslip, and blue with the gentian, and crimson with the rose.

While reading my text the fourth time I bethink myself that the story of life will end when the group breaks up. The "tale that s told" stops when listeners depart. The family group breaks up. Did you ever know a household that for twenty- five years remained intact? Not one. Was there ever a church record the same after the passage of twenty-five years or fifteen years or ten years? The fact is that the story of our life will soon end, because the group of listeners will be gone. So you see if we are going to give the right trend and emphasis, we must give it right away. If there are old people in the group of our influence, all we can do for them will be in five or ten years. If there are children around us, in ten or fifteen years they will no longer be children, and they will be fashioning the story of their own life. "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might." Passing all, passing everything, as a "tale that is told."

My text, in referring to the years, re- minds me that in twelve hours this year will forever have gone away. Ninety-nine out of the hundred years of this century will have disappeared. We have only one year of the century left. There ought to be something especially suggestive in the last year of a century. It ought to be a year of unparalleled industries, of un- heard-of consecration. Not a person in any of our audiences this day can remem- ber the first year of this century. Not a person in any of our audiences to-day will ever again see the last year of a century.

Oh, crowd this last year with prayers, with hosannas, with kind words, with helpfulness. Make the peroration of the century the climax of Christ-like deeds. Close up the ranks of God, and during this remaining twelve months charge mightily against the host of Abaddon. Have no reserve corps. Let us be jealous of every month, of every week, of every day, that passes without something signifi- cant and glorious wrought for God and this sin-cursed world. Let our churches be thronged with devout assemblages. Let the chorals be more like grand marches than requiems. Let this coming year see the last wound of Transvaal and Philip- pine conflict, and the earth quake with the grounding arms of the last regiment ever to be marshaled, and the furnaces of the foundries blaze with the fires that shall turn the last swords into plowshares.

And may all those whose lives shall go out in this last year of a century, as many will, meet in the heavenly world those who in the morning and noon-day of this hundred years toiled and suffered for the world's salvation, to tell them how much has been accomplished for the glory of him whose march through the last nine- teen centuries and through all the coming centuries the Scriptures describe as going forth "conquering and to conquer." Oh! the contrast between that uplifted specta- cle of eternal triumph in the presence of God and the Lamb, and these earthly scenes, where "we spend our years as a tale that is told."

Moody's Triumphant Death

"Heaven Opens and God is Calling Me," he Said

The Great Evangelist's Deathbed a Glorious and Memorable Victory for the Christian Faith—Unflinching Testimony to the Last

ROUND TOP, NORTHFIELD, WHERE MR. MOODY DESIRED TO BE BURIED

"DWIGHT L. MOODY has spent his first Christmas in heaven!"

Such was the fervent utterance of one who knew and loved the great evangelist who departed to be with Christ, December 22, and who has already realized, in that blessed land whither he has gone, the truth of the beautiful sentiment expressed in the hymn he loved so well in life and quoted so often:

"Some sweet morn a day will open, never more to close in night;
We shall hail the early token of its everlasting light.
Then we'll meet the friends long parted, once on earth a happy band:
Meet and dwell with them forever, over in the Morning Land."

There is a world of pathos and spiritual cheer in the story of the last hours of this faithful servant of the Master. Mr. Moody for several weeks had fought a brave and seemingly hopeful battle with mortal sick- ness, at his home in East Northfield. Tender care and solicitude had guarded his sickbed day and night, and loving hands had ministered to his every want. In the intervals of relief from pain and discomfort, he was full of the brightest hopes for the future, and looked forward with eager anticipation to the time when, as he fondly believed, he would be re- stored to health, and could once again take up the burden of his grand, soul- saving life-work.

But the Divine will had decreed that Mr. Moody's mission on earth was done —his task accomplished. Slowly and by degrees, the realization of this truth be- came fixed in the sufferer's mind, and his great heart, ready at all times to yield the most implicit obedience to his Master, overflowed with a gentle, loving acqui- escence, while his lips murmured, "Thy will done!" Comforted by the prayers of a multitude of God's people, and strength- ened by the assurances of their loving sympathy, which reached him daily and almost hourly, he contemplated the ap- proach of death with a calmness and resig- nation such as have rarely been witnessed.

His last day on earth was blest beyond all other days of his long life. Through- out the tedious night hours, his sick-room had not for a moment been deserted. On the preceding day (December 21), there had been a change for the worse, and the patient had occasional sinking spells. Be- sides Mrs. Moody and her sons, and Rev. A. P. Fitt and Mrs. Fitt (Mr. Moody's daughter), the two physicians, Drs. Scho- field and Woods, were in almost constant attendance.

Early in the morning of that last day, the sick man realized that his hours were numbered. He talked comfortably with his family, although he had intervals of semi-consciousness. Reviving after one of these, he opened his eyes to find the whole family grouped around his bed with deeply concerned faces.

"What is the matter? What is going on here?" he asked, as if in surprise. His voice was clear and strong and the family felt encouraged.

"Father," said one of his sons, "you have not been well, and so we came here to be beside you."

He continued to chat with them, giving little, if any, evidence of suffering. But the experienced physicians were not to be deceived. They recognized the signs of physical surrender, for when pain ceases, nature has run down her flag of resistance and the end is not far off.

To his sons, the dying evangelist had a message to deliver. They sat by his bed- side and he said, speaking clearly, and in a firm, though low voice:

"I have always been an ambitious man —not ambitious to lay up wealth, you un- derstand—but to leave you work to do. When I am gone, you are to continue the work of the schools at East North- field and of Mount Hermon and of the Chicago Bible Institute." And he looked up into their faces, with a gaze of earnest inquiry.

In subdued tones, the sons assured him that his wishes would be carried out with all the fidelity of which they were capable.

"But oh, father, we can't spare you!" cried his weeping daughter, as she threw herself down beside him.

The dying man looked at her for a mo- ment in silence. Then, with infinite gen- tleness, he said: "I am not going to throw my life away. If God has more work for me to do, I'll not die." The tone con- veyed more than the mere words. It was the tone of complete resignation to God's will: if God wanted him to live and to work longer—well; if his work was all done—he was ready for the final sum- mons.

It is probable that Mr. Moody per- ceived the approach of the end much earlier than did his family, or even the physicians. He contemplated death calmly and absolutely without trepidation; it was to him only a portal to everlasting bliss. "Earth is receding and heaven opening," he said in strong and jubilant tones, to his tearful bedside watchers. "God is calling me!"

As he spoke, his face seemed be light ed up and almost glorified. The strong, rugged, kindly features, no longer pain- racked, wore a serene smile, as though all the care and burden of earth had been suddenly dispelled by the first rays of the celestial glory, streaming through the open gates of heaven.

The last forenoon passed with alternate hopes and fears on the part of the house hold. With the dying Christian it was a period of holy calm. He was still strong in body, although the heart was becoming perceptibly weaker. Within an hour of noon, he asked to be assisted to rise, and his son William R. Moody with the aid of one of the doctors helped him up and seated him in a chair. In a little while he asked to be again put in bed. Soon afterwards, the unmistakable symptoms of death's nearness began to appear—the lowered vitality, quick, weak pulse and the faint articulation.

Several times, Mr. Moody's lips moved as though in prayer, but the words could not be heard by the family, who were now gathered about him. A little before noon, he aroused as if from partial slum- ber, to consciousness, and recognized those around him. This consciousness remained until within a moment of the end. In the brief interval he spoke comforting words to the weeping family, and declared anew his absolute confidence in God and his faith in Christ as his Saviour. His latest breath was the triumphant utterance of one for whom death held no terrors and who knew in whom he had believed.

So passed away Dwight Lyman Moody, in the sixty-second year of his age. Heart failure, complicated with kidney disease, was assigned as the cause of death. He was greatly overworked, his physicians declare, and the physical and mental strain of the last few years were such as to break down the once powerful frame. The mortal remains of the great evangel- ist will rest near the summit of Round Top, near his Northfield home, a little eminence from which he has addressed many religious gatherings in past years.

On the afternoon following Mr. Moody's death, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent this telegram to Mr. Wm. R. Moody, son of the evangelist, at Northfield:

"Kindly convey to your dear mother and accept for yourself my sincere and most heartfelt sympathy. You have suf- fered an irreparable loss. To me his death comes as a personal bereavement. He was my ideal of a true, whole-souled, sturdy, practical Christian, and I loved him dearly for his unwavering faith and his complete consecration. Indefatigable in his efforts to build up the Master's kingdom, he has endeared himself to every Christian heart, while his life has given an impetus to Christian work the world over, the full effect of which will, like the ripples of the sea, broaden out as the years go by. Since the days of Peter and Paul the world has had but one Moody, and countless thousands will re- joice throughout all eternity that he ever lived. What a reception he must have had, as he entered through the gates into the City of the New Jerusalem!

"LOUIS KLOPSCH."

Many hundreds of telegrams of condo- lence were received by the bereaved family from almost every section of the United States and Canada.

Mr. Moody's Death-Bed Testimony

EAST NORTHFIELD, MASS., Dec. 22.

LOUIS KLOPSCH, "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD," New York:

Mr. Moody had a triumphant entry into Heaven at noon.

As early as 8 o'clock, A.M., he said: "Earth is receding and Heaven opening. God is calling me."

He was perfectly conscious to the last, and showed the same courage and faith, unselfishness and thought for his wife and children and his schools as always.

His doctor says it was "a pure case of heart failure, due to absolute loss of bodily strength."

In leaving us he gave unflinching testimony to the truths he taught.

A. P. FITT.

∴ Fireside Talks About Jesus ∴

The Boyhood of Jesus
By Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts. International S. S. Lesson for Jan. 14. Luke 2: 41-52

The Carpenter's Son

"OUR story this time," said Uncle Will to the cross-roads farmers and their families, gathered as usual at Sabbath evening twilight for home-department Bible-study together, "is the story of a country boy lost in the city—not lost in the tragic sense in which many a country boy and girl has been lost in the city. This boy was soon found and came back clean to his mother, able to look her straight in the eyes even after a three days' street fair. The fairs of that country were as uniformly religious as ours are devilish. The boy of our story kept himself unspotted in the country, too; though his village, like many to-day, was far from spotless. Like a lily growing above the mud and miasma of a pond, this boy's white life developed, in spite of surrounding temptations, in the strength of purity, with a growth that included wisdom and every grace."

"In this story," said Tom Brown, "we see his beautiful humanity, not how unlike, but how like others of us he was—a real boy, who grew in body, mind, and soul. Last week we saw this plant out of the root of David burst into sight at Bethlehem. After that, to escape being cut down by Herod, it was transplanted for a year or so to the classic lotus beds of Egypt, and then brought back to Nazareth. Nearly a dozen years of silent growth had succeeded, years of commonplace—no gleaming star, no angel song, no gorgeous magi. The tree that promised healing to the nations had given no sign of flower or fruit; but in the story before us we come upon it at its awakening, as sweet and beautiful as an apple-tree in blossom, vocal with the love notes of the robin's nest."

"He fulfilled in all this, divine prophecies," observed Mr. Saunders. '"Out of Egypt have I called my Son, and he shall be called Nazarene.'"

The Period of Development

"We should not forget," said Ruth, "that this is not the only boy whose history is foretold. John, the cousin of Jesus, his mother was assured before his birth, was to be a great preacher and a temperance leader. The Old Testament Joseph had his manhood pictured as a golden sheaf, and then as a full-orbed sun. 'Every life is a plan of God.' Frank saw this afternoon a faint circle of the moon in the sky and exclaimed, 'There's the moon, but it's not lighted!' So in him and in every boy, I see manhood, but undeveloped. God sends the boy to playground and school and field of work and church that his life plan may be fulfilled, filled full of light and life. Like the moon, full-orbed manhood has four quarters: muscle, mind, manners and morals; all to be developed to the full. Success is not in equaling or excelling some one else, but in fulfilling God's plan for my life. If God made you to be a heartsease, Mabel, you are not to murmur because you are not a pine or a vine, but be the best little heartsease that ever you can."

"But," said Uncle Will, "though God's plans for our various lives are as different as the various plants, there is one respect in which the plan for all is alike: we are all to be Christlike. But even in this there is infinite variety. Those who imitate Christ with mechanical liberalness are really very unlike him. Not by imitation, but by impartation do we become Christlike. To know his spirit will lead us to do what Jesus would do to-day if he were living, not in a despotic heathen country as of old, but in a Christian republic. You are twelve, Isabel, as Jesus was in this story; what is it to be like Jesus?" Isabel answered, "To do as Jesus would do if he were a little girl on our farm."

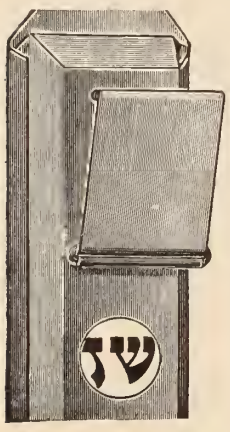
The Carpenter of Nazareth

"Turn that thought about if you would know what Jesus did in those silent years of boyhood and youth," Uncle Will resumed, "he did what any other Galilean carpenter boy would have done. The fact that only one story is put in the Bible out of all those thirty years in Nazareth suggests that in all else save sin his life was like that of other boys about him. The legends of miracles wrought by him in boyhood it would be a waste of time to tell. He moulded figures in mud, no doubt, birds as well as pies; but his mud birds did on fly, as foolish myths declare. He never used his miraculous powers except for useful ends; never merely to arouse wonder."



THE "MEZUZAH"

"This story carefully read," said Selah Brown, "suggests that the boy Jesus was fond of play; yes, and of mischief too, no doubt like any real boy. The artists who picture Christ's boyhood make his face too solemn."

"That reminds me," remarked Uncle Will, "of my visit to the school at Nazareth, where I saw the red-capped Arab and Syrian boys sitting cross-legged on floor mats, all reading aloud, but not by any means in concert, sentences they had written with reed pens on tin slates and were churning them into their memories by a forward and backward swaying of their bodies. As I leaned down to see the words, some rogue of a boy behind me pushed me forward and I almost fell into the class of laughing boys; but as the teacher rose in wrath with his long stick they all roared out their lessons louder than ever and rocked with increased fury to prove that they were absorbed in their studies. The boy Jesus might have played such a joke on me if I had visited the Nazareth school about the time of our story. And Jesus must have had all a boy's temptations, else it could not have been said, 'He was tempted in all points like as we are.'"

THE LAD JESUS IN JOSEPH'S WORKSHOP AT NAZARETH

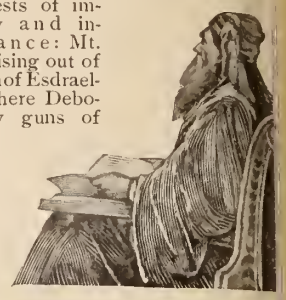
The Education of a Child

"The education of an Arab child of to-day," observed Mrs. Uncle Will, "falls far short of the education of an ancient Jewish child; which even excels, in the religious part at least, the training of the average American child of to-day. Before the child could be taught in words about God, while he was still an infant in arms, his attention was drawn to the mezuzah, which was attached to the entrance door of the house. This mezuzah was a shining metal case which contained the words of Deut. 6: 4-10, the command that the parents should keep God's laws in their hearts and teach them diligently to their children. This command was written on a piece of parchment, and tightly rolled, and fitted into the metal case. Nothing of the writing appeared; simply the name, "Jehovah," was in sight. The child saw the father and mother touch this case and reverently bow the head. The lesson of reverence, then, was the beginning point in the religious education of the child. His attention would next be directed to the curious leather box, the phylactery, which father wore upon his head, as a 'frontlet between the eyes,' and also to another, similar in appearance, which he bound upon his left arm. When the children asked, 'What mean these little boxes?' the parents would tell them, 'They contain the commands of God that we should diligently teach his words and laws to you, and that we shall bring you up to serve him.' At five years of age, the children began to learn the Scriptures by heart; at twelve or thirteen years of age, a boy was supposed to be so well informed that he could become a son of the commandment, a member of the church, in modern language. Religious instruction in the home formed a large part of the training of children, but this was supplemented by instruction in the synagogue schools which met not only on the Sabbath, but on every day of the week."

"But," interpolated Tom Brown, "the Jews exclaimed when Jesus showed his wisdom, 'How knoweth this man letters, never having learned?'"

"That," replied Mrs. Will, "does not refer to the ordinary schooling of the Jewish child, which was universal. That question refers to the higher training of those who became disciples of the Law. At the age of fifteen, if a boy showed some special aptitude, the scribes who visited the synagogue schools took him into their higher schools to train him in the hair-splitting arguments of their class. If Jesus had gone to one of these schools of the rabbis, they would have claimed that all his wisdom had come from them. His style was as different from theirs as sunlight is different from fog. Besides what Jesus learned in the home and in the synagogue, he was, no doubt, taught the history of his nation in a thrilling way by his mother, from the hilltop above the village where he dwelt, where could be seen, like a panorama, the whole of Palestine; Mt. Carmel close at hand jutting into the sea, where Elijah, the reformer, destroyed the priests of immorality and intemperance: Mt. Tabor rising out of the Plain of Esdraelon below, where Deborah's heavy guns of prayer fought with Borak against Sisera. The visit to Jerusalem when Jesus was twelve years old was an important part of his education, as of every boy's at that age. He had become a church member, as we would say, and was making his first visit since infancy to the temple. It was like a journey from Maine to Washington for a Christian boy of to-day, in which an intelligent mother, as companion, might point out the battlefield of Concord and the monument of Bunker Hill and on the Hudson the home of Irving, telling him stories of great battles and great men. To him the temple was capitol and cathedral both, the goal of his faith and patriotism alike. With what enthusiasm he sang, as he came in sight of Jerusalem, from one of the songs of the going up:



A JEWISH SCRIBE

They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion
Which cannot be removed, but abideth forever!
(Psalm 125: 1.)

"In what part of the temple did Jesus talk with the doctors?" Frank asked.

Mrs. Uncle Will, who had been teaching the children lessons from temple blocks, replied "You remember he had been in some part of the temple at least once before, brought in the arms of his mother. Mabel, what part of the temple must that have been?"

"The court of the women," Mabel answered.

"But now as he was twelve years old and a church member, he could go in the court of Israel and sit upon the steps of the terrace among those who gathered to be instructed by wise teachers."

The Holy Place

"Frank," said Mrs. Uncle Will, "do you think that Jesus ever went into the holy place inside of the temple?"

"No, for it was against the law for any one but the priests to go in there," Frank answered. "Jesus said, 'I came to fulfil the law, not to destroy it.' In the mosque that stands where the temple once stood, a pulpit is shown where it is said Christ was seated aloft when he talked with the doctors. This tradition is false to the modesty of the thoughtful but not assuming boy, who would not have taken the highest seat, but who talked of great themes 'in the midst' of the doctors, hearing them and asking them questions!"

"Hearing and asking," said the preacher, "that pictures, in two words, the most important essentials of a successful Sabbath School class."

Uncle Will here uncovered the home blackboard.

"Fervent in spirit, serving the Lord?"
"He shall stand before { kings" / THE KING.

"Twelve years is too young for a boy or girl to go to business, especially in this age of wealth and machinery!" said Mrs. Isaacs, "but not too young to enter earnestly upon the Father's business. I have heard Uncle Will say that in his last pastorate this truth was so strongly impressed, that very w children passed their thirteenth birthday fore joining the church."

"A boy in Palestine," Uncle Will remarked, as not twenty-one until he was thirty. It is then that he became of age. As thirty is twenty-one, twelve is to eight; so that eight -day corresponds to twelve in the time of sus. And eight happens to be the age that ir courts hold to be the age of responsibilty. have known children as young as five, to be telligent Christians and even church mem- rs."

Ruth Sanders (holding the Red Letter Testa- ent, in which the words of Jesus are pub- hed as its heart's blood) said: "This is the st recorded saying of Jesus, and we are told at Mary kept it in her heart, where we should it all the sayings of Jesus. We could learn em all by heart in a year or two, if we learned he new saying of his to repeat at every meal heart-food."

"That is a great saying for us working men," id Mr. Sanders, "'Is not this the carpenter?' he picture of Caracci—of which an engraving ngs, I am told, on the walls of the reputed rpenter shop of Joseph and Jesus at Naza- th—may well have been true; which repre- nts the boy Jesus as assisting Joseph at the nch, when about eight years of age, unable do anything heavier than to hold one end of e chalk-line, while Joseph snapped it to mark track for his saw on the board. I like that icture of Tissot, published in the papers re- ntly, of the boy Jesus at about the time of is story, bringing a board to Joseph on his houlder."

he Tools of he Worker At this point Uncle Will show- ed a set of carpenters' tools which he had brought from Nazareth, including a clumsy saw, working only n the back stroke; a chisel, with a fiddle-bow ttachment, to do the work of an auger; and a lane, with two projecting sticks, to draw it ward the carpenter; as the Orientals do al- host everything the opposite way from us. With such rude tools Christ worked even in oyhood; not spoiled, as are many boys of to- ay, by weeks and months of almost uninter- upted play."

"That reminds me," said Mrs. Uncle Will, of a story of a little boy who declared that he oved his mother 'with all his strength.' Asked o explain what he meant, he said, 'Well, you ee, we live on the fourth floor; nd there's no elevator, and the oal is kept down in the base- ment. I see to it that the coal- od is never empty. It takes ll my strength to get it up. Now, isn't that loving mother with all my strength?'"

"Christ made carpentry a di- ine trade," said Uncle Will, "as e afterward made healing the livine profession. Adam and hrist—unfallen man and God ncarnate—both worked with heir hands; one as a farmer, he other as a mechanic. It is mazing that in the church here can linger after nineteen hristian centuries so much nchristian prejudice against abor and laborers.

"In a church sociable held in a beautiful home of wealth, the astor was asked by the lady of the house, 'Who is that man yonder?' He answered, "Mr. Blank, a carpenter; a very nice man, very intelligent and culti- vated in some ways.' Drawing herself up haughtily, she replied, 'Well, I suppose it is all right at a church sociable.' In a nobler spirit, I dub thee, Sanders, knight of labor with the saw of Christ. Surely, the church that was founded by a carpen- ter, cannot despise or neglect the working man!"

"That reminds me," said the preacher, "how one of our trus- tees complained that our free pews brought in 'a lot of very common folks.' 'Why,' said he, 'the sexton found a dirty piece of carpenter's blue chalk in one of the pews last Monday.' I replied, 'Perhaps the carpenter's son of Nazareth happened in.'"

The Peasant Mechanic "Carpentry work," observed Uncle Will, "allied Christ, first, with the poor; second, with the active; third, with the majority of the race; fourth, with those whose lives, like his, for thirty of his thirty-three years, are commonplace and uneventful. To see Christ as he was for thirty years of his life, we must put aside the artists and see him working in the dress of a peasant mechanic, his face browned by the Syrian sun, his feet hardened by walking over stony roads, his hands roughened with toil."

"Shall we not open our hearts' doors to Jesus, who has come so near to us by sharing our toil, and sing:

'Come in, O gracious form, I say,
O workman, share my shed of clay!
Then I, at bench or desk or oar,
With last or needle, net or pen—
As thou in Nazareth of yore—
Shall do the Father's will again.'"

"I remember," said Uncle Will, "how, when we were in Shechem, in Palestine, where Mohammedans are numerous and bitter, the very children sneeringly called us 'Nazarini.' Oh, if we were only like enough to the Naz- arene to be called by any of his names! Let us not miss the larger meanings of Christ's carpentry. That Carpenter's soul was the workshop of the world, in which he wrought with bloody sweat as the builder of the city that hath foundations, the holy city coming down from God, His consummate work—not the saving of the sinner only but of the city."

After the Bible story was over, Frank came to his mother and said, "I will do anything Jesus wants me to do." His mother replied, smiling, "Well, then, for a start, you can climb those steps to your bed."

Frank replied, "How do you know Jesus wants me to go to bed?"

"I know," said his mother; "Jesus wants you to grow strong and to be obedient, just as Jesus was in his boyhood.

Armenian Perplexities

The news, which has been given in these columns, of another Armenian massacre, has naturally excited apprehension among mem- bers of the unfortunate race living here con- cerning their friends and rel tives at home. Besides, numbers of Armenians, who have become naturalized Americans, and who are now visiting their native land, may be in dan- ger. The following letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by Mrs. Mary R. Shekelton, 163 West 133d street, New York City, shows a feature of the situation:

Two orphans escaped with their lives from Marash. They have, with hard work, managed to go through a course fitting them for hospital work in Turkey as soon as return is possible. They have passed and are passing through paintul trials. I have helped them so far as I could, and we need a little outside aid.

A Prison-Worker's Bible

FROM a missionary worker in the prisons of the South to the proprietor of this journal, comes the following letter:

GAINESVILLE, FLA., Dec. 2, 1899.

DEAR SIR: As you are the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I now write to ask if you could give me a Bible, Revised Version, as de- scribed in December issue. I am engaged in mis- sionary work here through the South. A converted Catholic, my folks partly disown me on that account, and I am therefore out in the world de- pendent solely on our Heavenly Father, and thus far He has not failed me. I feel the Revised Version would be a great help to me. For twenty-two years I was deprived of the Word of God; for the past five years I have been a Protestant, and since I commenced to walk in the light, I have tried to help others by my feeble efforts.

I have a plain solid gold ring: it was my engage- ment ring, but my betrothed died. It is very dear to me; still, if you feel you couldn't give the Bible and would accept the ring, why I'd let it go, as I do need such a Bible. F. F. H.

To this letter the following reply was sent: "We take pleasure in forwarding to you a copy of the Revised Bible in verse form, and we pray that God may bless through you its use to the salvation of many precious souls."

. . At the . . "Midnight Mission"

New York's Latest Gospel Effort in the Heart of a Section Where Vice Everywhere Abounds

IN New York there is found almost every kind of resource known to the Christian heart to save the sin- ner. A recent new movement has been begun, taking the form of a "Mid- night Mission," which was opened on Eighth avenue, near Twenty-fourth street, on the outskirts of the district known as the "Tenderloin," and in the vicinity of concert halls, saloons and theatres.

MISS MAY AGNEW
Founder of the Midnight Mission

Miss May Agnew, Christian musician and missionary, has established this mis- sion to meet in the very centre of a great need, one of the wickedest sections of New York. Nightly services of song and prayer between the hours of nine and twelve were chosen, because it is then that the young are abroad in the streets; idle, impressionable and easily led astray. Miss Agnew says this work has been on her heart a long time. Prayer has been the impetus, and souls the end in view. Miss Agnew has music not only in her soul, but in her voice and fingers. She has great power over the hearts of her hearers, and has presided at the piano, herself leading the service of sacred song, and in playing at the same moment, in many great Gospel gatherings in New York and elsewhere. Her sister, also a faithful Christian musician, assists in this work. On the opening night there were many visiting speakers. There were earnest pleadings from both sinful men and women. The "poor rabble," as they are called—the noisy, turbulent gangs of the streets—came in, bent on some trouble. At the singing of the first hymn they rose in a body and departed. They have since returned in pairs and trios, and one of the number the following week asked for prayers.

Miss Sara Wray, a very earnest Chris- tian worker, gave an impressive testimony that Christ not only had saving, but keep- ing grace.

Mr. Murray, the evangelist, told of a champion chess-player's criticism upon the celebrated painting called "The Lost Game," in which a boy plays a game of chess with the devil. The champion said the boy had not lost the game, and, to prove it, sat down and won the game from the same combination of men on the chessboard in the painting. He won the game in two moves. Mr. Murray pointed the moral: The devil always thinks the game of life is lost, but in two moves—faith and believing—Christ al- ways wins it.

During the meetings there have been a number of conversions. An immigrant who landed in America only two days before was among the number. Another who fell into evil ways, and one year ago was behind bars, now testifies of the power to save and uplift the fallen.

The "Midnight Mission" is in the very heart of a number of resorts whose hab- itues are in great need of Gospel teaching. The proprietors of these places at first opposed the Mission, but now they regard it without disfavor, and place no obstacles in the way of the workers. It is a field in which the harvest is fully ripe and the laborers are few.

His Last Testimony

A death that carried its lesson to many hearts re- cently occurred at a testi- mony meeting in the New York Christian Home for Intemperate Men, Eighty- sixth street and Madison avenue. John Crawford, aged sixty-one, an honest tanner and an excellent workman when sober, stood up among his fellows to tell of his hard struggle against his lifelong enemy, strong drink; and of how, through God's help and mercy, he had at last won the victory. He said: "I am one slow of speech. It is not that I am ever ashamed to say a word for Christ, but I am ashamed of my many backslidings from the right way. I know that God has forgiven me, and that I am still a joint heir with Jesus." That was his last word. His eyes and his hands were uplifted as if in praise or petition; a smile was on his face, and while his hearers were listening for his further speech, he sank slowly back into arms that opened to receive him. The poor wayfarer had gone to his Father's house with Christ's name on his lips.

AN AMERICAN LANDMARK—THE FIRST TEXAN CAPITOL

This ruined building, two miles west of Columbia, Texas, is an interesting reminder that our Lone Star State was once our sister republic (1836–45). Little as its appearance suggests such distinction, the front room on the first floor has been a Senate Chamber: here, Oct. 4, 1836, when Texas had won her freedom from Mexico, a Provisional Congress met and listened to the first Presidential message delivered by David G. Burnett, Provisional President; and here, Oct. 22d, the first President of the new republic—famous Sam Houston—was formally installed. Near-by is "Independence Tree," a grand, old live-oak, with spreading, moss-draped branches; beneath which the declaration of Texan independence was read; and not far away is an old cemetery, in which heroes of the Mexico-Texan War lie sleeping; that last sleep which may not be broken by "wars or rumors of wars."

MY TIMES ARE IN THY HAND

MY times are in thy hand, O Lord;
Go thou, I pray, with me,
And I am safe; all will be well,
If I am close to thee.

Still, above all things else, I pray,
That thou my life wilt lead;
And use me in thy work of love,
Helpful in others' need.

Working with thee, promote thy cause
Of peace and love on earth;
Good-will to men, the angel song
At our Redeemer's birth.

And ever as the Christmastide
Comes with its sacred joy,
Anew I give my life to serve
In thy most blest employ.

Enthroned Evangelist

IT was a shock to Christendom—the telegram that announced the exit of Dwight L. Moody. His illness had alarmed us; but no one is ready for such a world-wide calamity as has fallen. We said to ourselves: "What will his lay-college and his Institute at Chicago do without him? What will Northfield, with its institutions of learning and mercy, do without him? What will the church universal do without him?"

The simple fact is that he has done the work of five hundred men. The cities, American and European, are full of the converts whom he brought to God, and of Christians whom he inspired for higher usefulness. He taught the pulpits how to preach and prayer-meetings how to pray and philanthropists how to contribute and Christian workers how to triumph. And all the obsequies that may be observed and all the obituaries that may be written and all the monuments that may be built to his memory cannot make him dead. He lives in the words he uttered. He lives in the books he has published. He lives in the institutions he established. He lives in the example of fidelity and righteousness and zeal which he has set before all nations.

And there is a consolatory thought in the fact that this good and great man deserves a rest. What toils, what fatigues, what self-sacrifice were his! What pull upon his nerves and brain the vast assemblages he addressed for more than thirty years! What physical and mental reactions must always come from such expenditure of the life forces. No wonder his heart gave way, for it had broken a thousand times in sympathies for the world he was helping to save. He was as much of a martyr as Latimer or Ridley or Hugh McPhail or Paul, the apostle. Not the fires of the stake nor the ax of the headsman touched him, but he was consumed with his great zeal for God and souls.

Surely, after all these years of self-denying devotion, he needed a rest for heart and head and hand and foot. That rest has come. His last sermon preached, his last prayer offered, his last journey ended! Joy to him, everlasting joy! What a throng welcomed him at the shining gate! They must have known in heaven he was coming. A great throng of those who had reached that city through his instrumentality must have come out to welcome him, and the Christ to whom he had invited uncounted millions of souls, on both sides the sea, I am sure, greeted him with the words: "Well done, good and faithful servant. I will make thee ruler over many cities."

The question will be asked: "Who will take his place?" No one. The Lord does not want any one to take his place. The first sermon I ever heard Mr. Moody preach was on the text: "To every man his work," and we must know that no two missions in the world are alike. He fulfilled his mission, and others will just as well fulfil their missions, and the work will go on until the day of the world's complete Gospelization. But neither on earth nor in heaven will church militant or church triumphant forget the apocalyptic Dwight L. Moody.

We were always impressed with the good common sense he mingled with his evangelism. Going to a town or city where he had been announced, he would immediately be surrounded by the representatives of all the newspapers of that place, and by the correspondents representing the press of other cities. He would immediately put before them his plans and ask their aid, and they all became his coadjutors; and the words he spoke in the evening would the next morning be put before the eyes of all the intelligent people of those communities. The same common sense he used in choosing co-workers, and in ignoring religious cranks who would disturb his meetings. He gave no time to the mere technicalities of religion, quarreled with no denomination, and never tried to explain the inexplicable. He put a warmth into the Gospel invitation which was felt by all who heard him, and by all who read his utterances.

How kind and encouraging a friend he was to the one who writes this paragraph, I may only hint. From the day he cabled me to come and help him in his meetings in London, at the opening of his greatest work, till the last brotherly words he uttered in these editorial rooms, he was to me a cheer and an inspiration. No tears could express my personal grief at his going. Good-by! my dear friend of many years, until we meet again in our Father's house to talk over the times when in the same harvest-field, side by side, we swung the sickles!

On the desolated home at Northfield may there come such influences consolatory that the sadness of the earthly parting may be overcome by the certain joy of celestial reunion! For such comfort for the bereft in our homes and in our churches, let us devoutly pray.

In this dark world of sin and pain,
We only meet to part again;
But when we reach the heavenly shore,
We there shall meet to part no more.
The hope that we shall see that day,
Should chase our present griefs away.

Mormon .. Heresies Exposed ..

Miss Helen Gould Sharply Criticises Brigham H. Roberts' Book—"A New Witness for God"

ALL over the land the people are waking up to a clear perception of the importance of the Mormon question. The attitude of Congress on the Roberts case, and the growing evidence of the fact that the country, as a whole, demands his rejection, has brought the whole Mormon question again to the front in our national affairs. Among those able and influential women who have bravely come forward as the opponents of the Mormon infamy, Miss Helen Gould easily stands first. Her utterances on the subject have already commanded wide attention. We give space below to the essential passages in a letter which she has just addressed to the League for Social Service, New York city. She writes:

"A short time ago I received 'with the compliments of the writer,' a pamphlet entitled Plural Marriage and the Manifesto. The Tribune and the Kinsman Answered, by Nathan Tanner, Jr. The book is an argument for polygamy. I desire, however, to call your attention particularly to A New Witness for God, by B. H. Roberts, as it has the endorsement of the Mormon Church and was published by George Q. Cannon & Sons' Company in 1895. As you know, George Q. Cannon is one of their three great leaders. You will find Chapter XXX., on 'Man's Place in the Universe,' very important, for it gives so clearly the Mormon point of view. I wish I might quote the whole chapter for you, but perhaps it will be better for me simply to give you an idea of the contents, and you can then judge for yourself whether it will be advisable for you to procure a copy. Mr. Brigham H. Roberts advances the theory that spirits of men before they tabernacled in bodies of flesh and bone on this earth, had an existence with God in another world; God is the father of their spirits, Jesus Christ being the first-born. We have also a mother in heaven. On page 460, Mr. Roberts says:

"The prophet also taught that the relationships formed in this life were intended to be eternal, not excluding that of husband and wife, with all its enduring affections. He taught that the marriage covenant which binds man and woman as husband and wife should be made for eternity, and not until 'death doth them part.'

"He then goes on to say:

"I wish to be perfectly understood here. Let it be remembered that the prophet Joseph Smith taught that man—that is, his spirit—is the offspring of Deity; not in any mystical sense, but actually; that man has not only a Father in heaven, but a mother also. And when I say that the prophet taught that the resurrection is a reality; that the relationship of husband and wife is intended to be eternal, together with all its endearing affections, I mean all that in its most literal sense. I mean that in the life to come man will build and inhabit, eat, drink, associate and be happy with his friends, and that the power of endless increase will contribute to the power and dominion of those who attain by their righteousness unto these privileges.

"Speaking further of this power of forever adding to his posterity, Mr. Roberts continues:

"It is one of the chief means of man's exaltation and glory in that great eternity which, like an endless vista, stretches out before him! Through it man attains to the glory of the endless increase of eternal lives, and the right of presiding as priest and patriarch, king and lord over his ever-increasing posterity. Instead of the commandment, "Be fruitful, and multiply and replenish the earth," being an unrighteous law, it is one by means of which the race of the gods is perpetuated, and it is as holy and pure as the commandment, "Repent and be baptized." Through that law, in connection with an observance of all the other laws of the Gospel, man will yet attain unto the power of the Godhead, and, like his Father—God—his chief glory will be to bring to pass the eternal like and happiness of his posterity.

"Next, Mr. Roberts argues that it is possible for men to become gods, and he quotes from the prophet Joseph Smith to show that the God whom we worship was once a man:

"God himself was once as we are now, and is an exalted Man and sits enthroned in yonder heavens. That is the great secret . . . Here, then, is eternal life—to know that only wise and true God, and you have got to learn [illegible] to become gods yourselves and to be kings [illegible] priests to God, the same as all gods have [illegible] before you—namely, by going from one [illegible] degree to another, and from a small capa[illegible] to a great one, from grace to grace, from [illegible] altation to exaltation, until you attain to [illegible] resurrection of the dead, and are able to d[illegible] in everlasting burnings and sit in glory, a[illegible] those who sit enthroned in everlasting po[illegible] (From a discourse preached by Joseph Sm[illegible] at Nauvoo, April 7, 1844. Millennial S[illegible] vol. xxiii., pp. 245–248).

"Polytheism is then distinctly taug[illegible] and I quote from page 466 the follow[illegible] passage:

"But if God, the Father, was not alw[illegible] God, but came to his present exalted position [illegible] degrees of progress, as indicated in the te[illegible] ings of the prophet, how has there been a [illegible] from all eternity? The answer is that th[illegible] has been and there now exists an endless [illegible] of gods stretching back into the eternities, t[illegible] had no beginning and will have no end. Th[illegible] existence runs parallel with endless durati[illegible] and their dominions are as limitless as bou[illegible] less space.

"Can one imagine a lower or more n[illegible] terialistic conception of spiritual thing[illegible] Below I quote the advertisement of [illegible] work to show you it has the approval [illegible] the Mormon Church:

"A New Witness for God. A work of [illegible] pages, treating of the divinity of the miss[illegible] of the Prophet Joseph Smith. The commit[illegible] appointed by the First Presidency to read t[illegible] manuscript of this work before it was pu[illegible] lished — viz.: Elders Franklin D. Richar[illegible] George Reynolds, and John Jaques—say [illegible] their report: 'Your committee, to whom y[illegible] referred the consideration of Elder B. [illegible] Roberts' new work, entitled, A New Witn[illegible] for God, respectfully represent that they ha[illegible] read it with great care and believe it to be [illegible] valuable addition to our church literatu[illegible] They find nothing therein calling for adve[illegible] criticism, but, to the contrary, find that it [illegible] orthodox and consistent with our teachin[illegible] There is harmony in its chapters which giv[illegible] much strength to its arguments, all of whi[illegible] point directly to the evidences, first of t[illegible] need of a New Witness for God, and ne[illegible] that Joseph the Prophet was that witne[illegible] The truths are emphasized on lines of reaso[illegible] ing different from those common to our elde[illegible] which carries to the work a freshness and [illegible] interest that will, we think, attract studen[illegible] and develop in our youth and others an i[illegible] creased love for the study of the great Latte[illegible] day work. Brother Roberts' work collat[illegible] and condenses a large amount of useful an[illegible] important information, historical and theolo[illegible] ical, which is often not readily accessible [illegible] the Elders and members of the church, b[illegible] which tends to broaden their views and e[illegible] large and enlighten their understanding of v[illegible] rious vital matters connected with the Gosp[illegible] of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

"Wishing you success in your effort[illegible] to have our people more thoroughly in[illegible] formed on the Mormon question, I remain[illegible]

"Very truly,

"HELEN MILLER GOULD."

BRIEF NOTES

A law now under the consideration of th[illegible] Congress of the Argentine Republic provides fo[illegible] the reading of the Bible in the public schools.

Preparations are being made for commenc[illegible] ing mission work in the Soudan as soon as per[illegible] mission is given by the Sirdar. The United Pres[illegible] byterian Church has a fund of eleven thousand[illegible] dollars ready to establish a mission in Khartoum.

Dr. S. B. Rossiter, pastor of the North[illegible] Presbyterian Church in New York, has accepted[illegible] the office of Secretary of the American Auxiliary[illegible] of the McAll Mission. Dr. Rossiter contemplates[illegible] retiring from the pastorate of the church which he[illegible] has held for twenty-six years.

The New York Sabbath Committee is be[illegible] ginning a crusade against the theatres in which[illegible] Sunday performances are given. They are adver[illegible] tised as concerts but as they are in many cases[illegible] ordinary theatrical performances, the committee is[illegible] moving against them under the law.

The Ecumenical Missionary Conference, to[illegible] be held in New York in March next, will have[illegible] many distinguished members. Sixty-one delegates[illegible] have already arranged to attend. They come as[illegible] representatives of missionary societies in Germany,[illegible] Denmark, England, Norway, Sweden, Holland and[illegible] Switzerland.

Dr. L. W. Munhall is holding services at[illegible] Wilkesbarre, Pa. They were commenced Dec. 1 in[illegible] the First Methodist Church which has been crowded[illegible] every evening. A remarkable service was the one[illegible] on Dec. 10 in the First Presbyterian Church. This[illegible] was for young people only and was very impressive.[illegible] Every part of the church was filled long before the[illegible] hour of commencing, and hundreds were unable to[illegible] obtain admission. There is every indication of the[illegible] revival being very deep and extensive.

It is reported that efforts are now being made by the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, in New York, to secure as pastor in succession to the late Dr. John Hall, Professor George T. Purves, D.D., of Princeton. He occupies the chair of New Testament Exegesis in the Theological Seminary, and is also pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Princeton. It is understood that Rev. G. Campbell Morgan, who was the first choice of the session, will not accept an invitation unless it is unanimous, and the fact of his being a Congregationalist prevents that unanimity.

Colorado's New Capitol

IVIC pride is justly gratified by the new building at Denver, which Colorado has erected as her new capitol. A photograph of the magnificent edifice appears on this page. It is probably the finest public building of its kind in the whole of the West. A distinguishing feature of it is the great dome, which is designed to be a State memorial of the greatest of Colorado's citizens. It will contain sixteen windows, which will have portraits of such noted characters as Ouray, Chief of the Utes; Kit Carson, Gen. Denver, etc. Among the women whose names have been suggested for representation in this miniature Pantheon are Mrs. Augusta Tabor, Mrs. Boone, wife of the Scout; and Margaret W. Campbell, the enthusiastic pioneer in the struggle for woman suffrage. The edifice is a model of architectural skill and arrangement in the accommodations it affords for the various departments of the public service. The grounds in which it stands have been laid out with great care by the best landscape gardeners of the West, and on them alone, over fifty thousand dollars have been expended. It may be hoped that the new building will always have that adornment which will tend more to the welfare of the people of that great State than architectural beauty—the righteousness of the men who occupy its offices.

Righteousness exalteth a nation: but sin is a reproach to any people (Prov. 14: 34).

Singular Lapse of Memory

The police at a station in Williamsburg, N. Y., had to deal with a peculiar case one night last week. A man with a big sand cart and a team of horses came to the station-house in a dazed condition. He said he was from Poland, but he had been several years in this country. He had gone to work for a contractor, whose name he could not remember. He had been sent to a sand-pit, where the wagon was filled with sand. Thence he drove to another part of the city, where some houses were being built, and there he had dumped the sand. He was driving back to the sand-pit for another load when he seemed to lose all knowledge of his route and of what he had to do. He had driven until dark in the hope that he would see some familiar landmark, or that his memory would return. Some one in whom he confided had advised him to apply to the police and had shown him the way to the station. He had not been drinking, but he could not remember where he was going, nor where he came from, nor where he lived. The police kept him at the station for the remainder of the night, feeling sure that inquiries would be made for him in the morning. His condition is extraordinary and calls for medical attention. It is not often that we hear of such a case; but it is not at all uncommon to find people who in the far more important matter of the soul are similarly ignorant as to their origin and destination, but think only of present indulgence.

Let us eat and drink for to-morrow we shall die (Isaiah 22: 13).

Fished in a Barrel

A Maine journal, which devotes its attention to sporting matters, describes a surprise which a fisherman experienced recently. He was standing on the apron of a dam, fishing in the quick water below, and had met with fair success. Near the shore, on his right hand, in a little eddy, he noticed a barrel lying on its side in several feet of water. He was curious about the barrel, and went down to examine. He found that it was an old molasses barrel, and was lying so that he could see the bung hole. Of course, the barrel was full of water, and there was a noise as if there was a fish inside of it. He dropped his hook through the hole, and no sooner had it landed there than the water was boiling, and the fisherman knew he had a trout on the other end. But it was so large that it would not come through the hole. He secured a saw and sawed a piece out of the top of the barrel. The fish came out. It weighed three pounds, and was one of the handsomest squaretails caught in that section this year. One of the guides said that the trout must have gone into the barrel when small, and had lived on bugs and worms which had taken up their abode inside until it grew too big to get out. It must have had an easy time, but its ease was fatal. Men have sometimes suffered from a similar cause. In pursuit of wealth or power, they have entered into occupations, or associations, which they knew to be detrimental to their best interests, but which they intended to quit when they had attained their object; but when that time came they found the way of escape barred and themselves bound by chains of their own forging. There is no more successful device of the enemy than that of the suggestion that a wrong-doer can reform whenever he wishes. Prosperity is often more fatal to the soul than adversity.

Fulness of bread and abundance of idleness were in her and her daughters and they were haughty. Therefore I took them away as I saw good (Ezek. 16: 49, 50).

COLORADO'S NEW STATE CAPITOL AT DENVER

For Premature Burial

A strange exhibition was given in New York last week, by two Frenchmen of an apparatus by which if a person were buried alive and recovered consciousness in the coffin he could give an alarm. The life-saving apparatus consists of a tube four inches in diameter, which extends down to the coffin and fits into a hole in the lid over the breast of the person inside. Attached to the upper end of the tube is a metal box which is visible above the grave. In the box is a bell, and fixed to the lid is a rod on the end of which is a brass ball. Through the tube leading to the coffin, a small rod is run with a ball on the end, placed just above the breast of the supposed corpse. The person who has been prematurely buried, it was explained by the inventor, would upon coming to in the grave, simply have to put his hand up and either push up or pull down the ball above his breast. This would set the bell above ringing for half an hour. A proposed addition is a connection with a central telephone office where a bell rings when the buried man pushes the ball. There may be some people with a nervous dread of being buried alive who will ask their relatives to have such an apparatus fixed on their graves. There is, however, reason to doubt whether any one is ever buried before he is dead. A much more important matter is it for people to take account of that day of universal awakening, which will surely come, and to prepare for it.

The hour is coming in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done ill to the resurrection of judgment (John 5: 28 R. V.).

Gen. Lawton Killed

Sincere sorrow was expressed throughout the country when the news was received from the Philippines that Gen. Lawton had been killed in battle. Few officers in the army had so thoroughly won the admiration of the soldiers and the general public as this great man who had distinguished himself in the service of his country. From the dispatches describing the sad event it appears that he set out from Manila on Monday night Dec. 18, to occupy the valley of Mariquina, fifteen miles to the north, which has been an insurgent stronghold throughout the war. Traveling with a small escort, over a hilly country, through a pouring rain, he reached San Mateo, a town at the head of the valley, shortly before daybreak. The town has a lofty mountain in its rear and a broad, shallow stream in front. The force had to cross the stream under a heavy fire from the insurgent trenches. Gen. Lawton made his men lie down in the rice-fields and send a few volleys preparatory to crossing. His stalwart figure, conspicuous in a white helmet, immediately became a mark for the enemy's sharpshooters. His staff officers called to him, warning him of his danger, but he laughed and strode on along the firing line. Suddenly he was seen to stagger and fall. His men rushed to him while others ran for the surgeons. But all efforts were useless; he had been shot through the heart and his death was almost instantaneous. His body was placed on a litter and, while the ringing cheers of his troops rushing to the capture of the town reverberated through the valley, six grief-stricken soldiers bore the remains of their beloved chief from the field. He was not yet fifty-seven years of age and was in the full vigor of manhood. Standing over six feet in height with a broad muscular figure, he looked every inch a soldier. His first service was in the Civil War; when, at the age of eighteen, he served as sergeant of a company of Indiana infantry. In May, 1862, he was promoted to a captaincy. Two years later he was made Lieutenant-Colonel, and at the close of the war was brevetted Colonel "for gallant and meritorious service." He immediately sought a commission in the regular army and was appointed. He distinguished himself in the campaigns against the Indians, notably in 1886 in the pursuit of Geronimo. At the opening of the war with Spain he again offered himself for active service. At El Caney, his gallantry won him the personal congratulations of the President, and throughout the Santiago campaign he did valiant service. In January, 1899, he was sent to the Philippines. His services in the capture of San Isidro and other towns called forth praise on all hands and the President sent him a message of congratulation. His nomination to the rank of Brigadier-General was being written when the sad news of his death came to hand. A man so devoted to the service of his country, so brave, and so indifferent to his own comfort and safety, is an example to the soldiers of Christ in their lifelong warfare, so that when death comes to them they may have the consolation of the apostle:

THE LATE MAJOR-GENERAL LAWTON

I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness (II. Tim. 4: 8).

A Prisoner's Plea

A pathetic letter was read by Judge Newburger, in the General Sessions Court in New York, on Dec. 15. It came from a prisoner who was then in the dock waiting for sentence. The writer said that he had not had a free Christmas for twenty-two years, and he longed beyond the power of words to express, to spend the day this year outside the walls of a prison. It appeared from his record that he had been arrested in 1877 and tried for grand larceny. He had been convicted and sentenced. There had been several charges against him, and, when he had served his term for one offence he was rearrested as he left the penitentiary and tried for another. In November last he was once more a free man, but there was one more charge pending, and he was arrested as his discharge papers were handed to him. He was the more disappointed, because he had learned in prison a trade, by which he could support himself honestly and was hoping to lead a right life. All this he explained in his letter to the judge, and begged him when he should be brought up for sentence to give him a chance. An officer corroborated his story of good behavior in prison and his learning a trade. The judge having read the letter in open court, gave the prisoner some good advice and suspended sentence. The man was so overcome with joy that he was unable to walk and an officer had to lead him out of court. The plea that availed in his case was probably not that of the suffering he had already undergone, but his determination to lead an honest life in future. Punishment has accomplished its best purpose when it has led to the reformation of the criminal.

They shall bear the punishment of their iniquity that they may be my people, and I be their Lord (Ezek. 14: 10, 11.)

Samantha in Mormon-Land

SALT LAKE CITY lays in a rich valley at the foot of a range of snow-capped mountains that tower up 'round it, seemin' to the saints, I spoze, as if they wuz heavenly ramparts to protect 'em from evil; and lookin' to them that despise the saints' ways and customs, as if the very earth itself was liftin' up its high hands in horrow at their deeds. But to me, hanted as I wuz by a memory, the mountains looked some like old men with white hair; as his would be when he got older if he wuz'nt bald. I knew that I ort not to think on it, but it would come onbid. It is a beautiful city with electric lights, electric railways, broad streets lined with lofty trees, and little rivulets of pure cold snow-water runnin' along the side of 'em. The houses are clean and comfortable looking, with well-kep' lawns and gardens about 'em and flowering shrubs. The temple is a magnificent building; it towers up to heaven, as if it wuz jest as sure of bein' right as our Methodist Episcopal steeple at Jonesville. Though we know that the M. E. steeple, though smaller in size, is pintin' the right way and will be found out so on that day that tries souls and steeples and everyhing else.

The old Bee Hive (where the swarm of Mormons first hived and made gail or honey—I d'no which, or mebby both)—is also an interestin' sight to meditate on. It is shaped a good deal like one of them round straw bee hives you see in old Sabbath School books. The bride and groom went to their own home to live, on whom we called, or Tommy and I did, and left 'em well situated and happy; and I told him, sez I: "If you 'tend strict to the eighth commandment, you'll git along first rate."

And he said that he felt that he could rise to any height of goodness with Baby's help. And she scoffed at the idee of pa ever payin' any attention to any other woman but her, when he worshiped her so.

Well, so other men have felt and got led off, but I won't forebode. But I left 'em happy in their own cozy home, which I wuz glad to think I could describe to Phileman and Ann if I ever see that blessed haven, Jonesville, agin.

We went out to visit the Mineral Springs. It only took us about ten minutes on the train, and it only took us about half an hour to go to Garfield Beach. It is the only sand beach on Salt Lake, and some say it is the finest beach in the world, and they say that the sunsets viewed from this spot are so heavenly bright in their glowin' colors that no pen or tongue can describe 'em. The blue-green waves wuz dancin' as we stood on the shore, and we wuz told that if we fell in, the water would hold us up, but didn't try it, bein' in sunthin' of a hurry.

Through "Jordan Valley"

At Miss Meechim's strong request we went on a pleasant trip to York City through the valley of the River of Jordan. How good that name sounded to me! How much like scripter! But, alas! it made me think of one who had so often sung with me on the way home from evenin' meetin', as the full moon gilded the top of the democrat, and the surroundin' landscape:

By Jordan's stormy banks we stand
And cast a wistful eye
On Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie.

Oh, human love and longing, how strong thou art! I knowed that him meant the things of the sperit, but my human heart translated it, and I sithed and felt that the Jordan my soul wuz passin' through wuz indeed a hard pathway, and I couldn't help castin' a wishful eye on Jonesville's fair and happy land, where my earthly possession, my Josiah, lay.

"WE ALL SOT DOWN IN THEIR LARGE, COOL PARLOR"

A Mormon Invitation

But to resoom. We had hearn that Polygamy wuz still practiced there, and we had hearn that it wuzn't. But every doubt on that subject wuz laid to rest by an invitation we all had to go and visit a Mormon family livin' not fur off, and Miss Meechim and I went, she not wantin' Dorothy to hear a word on the subject. She said with reason, that after all her anxiety and labors to keep her from marryin' one man, what would be her feelin's to have her visit a man who had boldly wedded 'leven wives and might want a even dozen!

I could see it to once, so didn't urge the matter, but left Tommy with her and Aronette. As nigh as I could make out, the Mormons had felt that Miss Meechim and I wuz high in authority in Gentile climes, one on us had that air of nobility and command that is always associated with high authority, and they felt that one on us could do their cause much good if they could impress us favorable with the custom, so they put their best twenty-four feet forward and did their level best to show off their doctrine in flyin' colors. But they didn't do any good to "one on us," nor to Miss Meechim, either; she's sound in doctrine, though kinder weak and disagreeable in spots.

Well, we found that this family lived in splendid style, and the husband and all his pardners acted happy whether they wuz or not. And I d'no how or why it wuz, but when we all sot down in their large cool parlor, Miss Meechim and I in our luxurious easy chairs, and our host in one opposite with his wife occupyin' 'leven chairs at his sides, a feelin' of pity swep' over me—pity for that man.

Yes, as I looked at that one lonely man, small boneded at that, and then looked at them 'leven portly wimmen that called that man "our husband," I pitied him like a dog. I had never thought of pityin' Mormon men before, but had poured out all my pity and sympathy onto the female Mormons. But havin' a mind like a ox'es for strength, I begun to see matters in a new light, and I begun to spozen to myself, even whilst I sot there with my tongue keepin' up a light dialogue on the weather, the country, etc., with the man and his wife ('leven on 'em). I spozed what if they should all git mad at him at one time how wuz he goin' to bear their 'leven rages flashin' from twenty-two eyes, snortin' from 'leven upturned noses, fallin' from 'leven angry voices, and the angry jesters from twenty-two scornful hands. Spozein' they all got to weepin' on his shoulder at one time how could one shoulder blade stand it under the united weight of 'leven full-sized females, most two ton of 'em, amidst more'n forty four nervous sobs, for they would naterally gin more'n two apiece. In sickness now, if they wanted to soothe his achin' brow, and of course they would all want to, and have the right to. But how could twenty-two hands rest on that one small fore-top? Sixty-six rubs at the least figger, for if they stroked his forehead at all they would want to stroke it three times apiece, poor creeter! would not delerium ensue instead of sooth? And spozein' they all took it into their heads to hang on his arm with both arms fondly whilst out walkin' by moonlight, how could twenty-two arms be accomodated by two small scrawny elbows?

"A HALL BOY COMES UP TO ME"

It couldn't be done. And as I mused on't I spoke right out onbeknown to me, and sez I:

Samantha's Indignation

"The Lord never meant it to be so; it hain't reasonable; it's aginst common sense."

And the hull twelve sez, "What didn't the Lord mean? What wuz aginst common sense?"

And bein' ketched at it, I sez, "The Mormon doctrine;" sez I, "to say nothin' on moral and spiritual grounds, and state rights, it's against reason and against good sense."

I felt mortified to think I had spoke out loud, but had to stand my ground after I had said it.

But they all said that the Mormon doctrine wuz the true belief, that it wuz writ in heaven, then it wuz engraved on plates, and dug up by Joe Smith, a Latter Day Saint.

Sez I, "If anybody trys to prove sunthin' they want to, they can most always dig sunthin' up to prove it. You say a man dug this plate up; what if some woman should go to diggin' and find a plate provin' that one woman ort to have 'leven husbands?"

"Oh, no!" sez the man in deep scorn, "no such plate could be found!"

The wimmen all looked as if they would kinder like to see such a plate, but they all sez faintly, "We don't spoze that it could be found."

"But," I sez, "you don't know how many plates there are in the ground, nor who'll dig 'em up."

"Oh, that idee is preposterous!" sez the man, as visions of dividin' one woman's heart into eleven parts, and reignin' over that little mossel riz up before him.

"Men never would agree to that; there would be mutiny, internal bloodshed and sizm."

"Well," sez I, "mebby there is more or less internal heart bleedin' goin' on in the wimmen's hearts that have to divide a man's love and care a dozen times."

Sez I, "A hull man's hull affections are onstiddy and wobblin' and oncertain enough without dividin' it up so many times."

Them wimmen wuz touched. I see a answerin' gleam of understandin' come into about twenty-one eyes as I spoke; one on 'em stood firm and looked hauty and cast iron, but I mistrusted that it wuz a glass eye, but don't know, it might have been principle.

And even on the man's small-sized countenance my words had seemed to make a impression. But yet he didn't want to give up in a minute; he spoke of how the Mormons had flourished since they come to Utah, how they had turned the desert into a garden, and he felt that the Lord must look on 'em favorable or they wouldn't be so prosperous.

"Yes," sez I, not wantin' to lie, "your country is beautiful, it is in a flourishing state, and shows the good results of systematic labor, industry and ambition; you have made the desert bloom like the rosy, many of your ways and customs might be followed with profit by older communities, and more orthodox accordin' to my idees. But I don't know as your flourishin' in worldly affairs is any sign of God's favor," and I mentioned the scripter concernin' who it wuz that flourished like the green bayberry tree. So bein' driv out of that argument, he sez, forgittin' his own eleven proofs aginst his story bein' true:

"Polygamy is done away with anyway; the United States have abolished it in Utah."

And I sez: "Well, I should be glad to think that wuz so, for one husband and one wife is as much as the Lord in his mercy ort to ask one human creeter to tend to and put up with. Not but what marriage is a beautiful institution and full of happiness if Love props it up and gilds it with its blessed ray. But one is enough," sez I firmly, "and enough is as good as a feast."

Miss Meechim sot silently by durin' this eloquent discussion—what she felt, she that abhorred the institution of marriage anyway—what she felt to look on and see folks so much married as these wuz, will forever remain a secret, but her looks wuz queer, very, and her nose fairly sought the heavens, it wuz held so high. A few of the wives brought in some refreshments to refresh us, and a few more waited on us and the small husband of their eleven hearts, and almost immegiately we tore ourselves away, takin' in ourn as we left, the hand of the husband and the eleven right hands of the wife.

An Unexpected Caller

A little while after we got back from our visit to the Mormon family, I wuz sittin' in the handsome parlor of the tarven by Miss Meechim's side, Dorothy settin' at the piano acrost the room playin' low, dreamy melodies as if to her own soul and ourn, ruther than to our ears, when a hall boy, most covered with buttons, come up to me, bearing a note on a little silver plate, for all the world as if it wuz vittles of some kind he wuz passin'. I took it with dignity and opened and read it with the same mean on me, though surprise laid holt on me as I read, and I sez to Miss Meechim:

"For gracious' sake! if this letter hain't from Brigham Roberts, askin' a augence with me." (I knowed that two of his wives had had a fever, and one on 'em, the bilerous colic, and he had had to come on from Washington to bathe their three achin' brows and press their six fevered hands).

"Well, of course you will see him," sez Miss Meechim. "I will take Dorothy out of the hotel whilst he is here," sez she anxiously.

Sez I, "I guess she would be safe up in your room with the door locked."

"Oh no," sez she, "I will have her put on a thick veil and will take her out milds away, and we will take Tommy with us, and you can receive him in our settin' room. It is probable a affair of State he wishes to see you on."

I had riz up high in her estimation, I could see by attentions from statesmen, or them that wanted to be. So it wuz arranged as she spoke on. At her request I sot the time I would see him fur enough ahead so she could git Dorothy three milds away before he come. And these formalities bein' attended to, I put on my cameo pin, and sot enrobed in my gray alpacky and dignity, lots of dignity, awaiting the coming of Mr. Roberts.

Mr. Roberts Wants Advice

At last he entered. I wuz anticipating meeting him with a cool stateliness, befitting my feelings towards him and his beliefs and practices. But I wuz took off my guard by his anxious, excited, onhappy mean. He rushed forwards and grasped holt of my hand with both of hisen, as if I wuz his only hope and refuge, and sez he:

"O mom, I have come to you as a sufferin' fellow creature!" and still holdin' my hand in hisen (though I tried to draw it away for Josiah's sake, as well as my own) but he continued to pour out incoherent words of agony and I felt that he didn't know what he wuz graspin' holt on no more than a drowndin' man.

"I know," sez he, "that you stand high with the public: I know your influence can help me, and I pray you as one suffering human being prays another, to help me; give me some succor and relief!"

With one tremendious effort I freed my hand from his frenzied grip, and sez in a calm voice, though his excitement and distracted mean wore on me a sight:

"Be calm, sir; and tell me in a coherent manner what I can do for you, and if it is reasonable, if it is anything I can do with justice to Josiah, and Duty, and the Nation, and the children, and grandchildren, I will do it."

Agin he poured forth frenzied words of distraction, his sentences falling over each other, and his words trippin' each other up, till I could sense nothin', only that here wuz a soul wrestlin' in deep agony before me, and I sez agin:

"Tell me in plain words to once what you want, or else leave the presence," sez I, rizin' and pintin' to the door post. It wuz a grand jester, my mean wuz all dignity, and he wuz frightened for fear I would leave him without hope, and he bust forth in loud agonized tones:

He Wanted to "Set Down"

"I want to set down! Do you know—duz the Nation know," sez he wildly, "how long I've been kep' standin' up? I want to set! I've got to set down!" sez he, and he covered his face with his hands and busted into tears.

I pitied him, much as I despised some of his deeds and beliefs; I pitied him like a dog. But I see that I must control myself and not let him see the sympathy I felt, if I wuz to do him any good, for he wuz pacin' the room back and forth agin like a lame lion who is stirred up in its lair. I pinted towards a big arm chair and sez I:

"Be sot, sir!"

"Oh, no!" sez he, in wild fearful axents, "Oh, no! the Nation hain't willin' for me to set! I've got to bear it, I spoze. But, oh, help me!" sez he "do help me! Go to your President—or no, I'll tell you what's betier—see the man who fixed the Canteen law for him; he can do what he wants to; he can wiggle through any place bigger than a cambric needle. Mebby there is some high church officials, some Bishops that would help. Or no, go to the head of it all; go to the Liquor Power, that's the place to go to; that rules Church and State; that makes the laws. Oh, do go to the Liquor Power," sez he, "and git it to let me set. I'll pay as much as is their usual price for makin' personal laws in a man's favor."

The glare in my gray eye froze the words on his lips. My pity wuz all gone, in the place of my gushin' sympathy wuz a frozen reservoir of contempt and disdain.

"You ask me to go to the Liquor Power for help!" sez I, "Do you know who you're speakin' to?"

"Yes," sez he feebly, as he stood half bent, fagged out, but still tottlin' on his feet, "I am speakin' to Josiah Allen's wife, and I want to set." He looked worse than ever, his last hope seemed to have fled. He see I wouldn't help him; I wuz jest on the pint of leavin' him alone when he agin' murmured pitifully, "I want to set, I want to set down."

His axent wuz heart broken, and I fancied that there wuz a little tone of repentance in it. Could I influence him for the right?" I felt that I must; I reached up the arms of my soul and took a firm grip, and sez in a low, deep voice:

"I will help you set, if you'll set where I want you to."

"Oh tell me," sez he, "tell me where you want me to set!"

"Not in the high halls where justice is administered," sez I, "not to set up there with the pictures of your three wives on your heart, to make laws condemnin' a man who has one extra wife to prison for twenty years, which same law would condemn you to prison for forty years. That wouldn't be reasonable," sez I. "Presidents and Senators are not sot up there in Washington, D. C. as examplers for the young to foller and stimulate 'em to go and do likewise. Such an example as yourn would stimulate 'em too much in matrimonial directions, and land 'em in prison."

He turned round in his haltin' walk and said sunthin' about lots of public men havin' other wives in secret.

"In secret?" sez I, "well, mebby so, but it has to be in secret, hid away, wropped in disgrace, and if the law discovers it they're punished. That is a very different thing from makin' such a life respectable, hidin' the husband and wives under the mantilly of the law, embroidered, too, with public honors."

He turned away despairin'ly, and murmured mekanically the old heart-broken wail, "I want to set. Months have gone by, and years, and I hain't been let to set down. I want to set!"

And I sez reasonably: "There is no objection to your settin' down, and if I had my way you would set right down by them who have done only half or a quarter what you have, and in the place the laws have made for them and you—right there in prison," sez I, "there is good stun seats for all on you."

The Right Place "to Set"

He turned quick as a wink: "Then you won't help me?"

"Yes," sez I, "I'll help all I can to put you right in with the others that have done jest what you have—openly set our laws at defiance. But if I know myself," sez I, "I won't help a tiger cat to hold a canary bird, or a woif to guard a sheep pen. I won't help a felon up on the seat of justice to make laws for innocent men."

"Innocent men!" And agin he sez, "Ha! ha!"

And agin I didn't care what he said. And I got up and sez: "Mr. Roberts, you may as well leave the presence," and as he turned I sez in conclusion, thinkin' mebby I had been too rash: "You have intellect, Brigham Roberts, and are a good man so fur as I know, only in this one iniquity and open defiance of our laws, and I advise you to turn round in your tracts, and get ready to set down on high, for you'll find it a much worse thing to prance round through all eternity without settin', than it is not to set here."

He just marched out of the door and never said good-bye, or good-day or anything. But I didn't care.

When Miss Meechim come back I wuz settin' calm and serene in her big chair windin' some clouded blue and white yarn, Aronette holdin' the skein; I had brung along a lot of woolen yarn to knit Josiah some socks on the way, to make me feel more homelike.

And the next day we proceeded on to California.

"I PINTED TOWARDS A BIG ARM CHAIR, AND, SEZ I, 'BE SOT, SIR!'"

Founded a Century Ago

THE Fourth Presbyterian Church in West Philadelphia celebrated the century mark of its existence with appropriate exercises on Sunday, December 3, 1899. Rev. Dr. Worden presided during the day. Rev. W. M. Rice, D.D., who was its pastor for ten years, delivered an historical address, and Rev. Dr. Benjamin L. Agnew gave the centennial address. In the afternoon a Sabbath School celebration was held, at which time the superintendent, George Cleeland, gave an historical sketch of the school, telling of its progress in past years and its flourishing condition to-day. Appropriate evening services were conducted by Rev. Dr. Worden. On the following Wednesday evening there was a social reunion of former and present members and friends of the church. The history of the Fourth Church dates back to the year 1798, when part of the Third Church withdrew, and in June, 1799, organized the Fourth Church, with the Rev. George C. Potts as pastor, worshiping in a small frame building on the south side of Lombard street, west of Third. In 1802 a church was built at the corner of Fifth and Gaskill streets, where the congregation worshiped for forty years. In 1835 Dr. Potts resigned and was succeeded by the Rev. Wm. McCalla. In 1842 a new church was dedicated at the corner of Twelfth and Lombard streets. Here the congregation continued to worship until 1891, when they removed to their present location and erected a substantial stone edifice comprising a chapel seating about 400. The membership of the church is about 400, and the Sabbath School about the same. There is a thriving Christian Endeavor Society.

ARRIVAL OF GORDON HIGHLANDERS AND DUBLIN FUSILIERS

RECENT reverses in South Africa seem to have aroused the warlike spirit in England to a point seldom reached in previous campaigns. It has been decided to send forward to the Cape a vast army of reinforcement, especially cavalry and artillery, and transports are even now on the way. It is said by English military authorities that Great Britain's army in the South African field will be 175,000 strong. A unique corps will be the Mounted Yeomanry, from 3,000 to 5,000 strong, and similar in many respects to our Rough Riders in the late Spanish-American war. Australia, New South Wales and Canada are also preparing each a second contingent, and the Colonial troops in Cape Colony and Natal will be represented in the field in larger proportion than before.

Meanwhile the Boers are strengthening their positions both in Natal and between the Modder River and Kimberley.

Our correspondent, Charles S. Morris, writes us from Cape Town, describing the extensive military preparations there, and enclosing a number of photographs, several of which appear on this page. One of the illustrations shows the Royal Irish Fusiliers landing at Durban, Natal. This famous regiment was ambuscaded, and many were captured by the Boers. They broke down and cried like children when they discovered that there was nothing for them to do but surrender.

Another picture is that of a detachment of Zulu police. England has a great reserve army in the countless thousands of natives who oppose the Boers, and who would ask nothing more than a chance to rise against them. Civilization would shudder were the black tribes to rise in the present campaign. Another photograph shows the Gordon Highlanders and Dublin Fusiliers arriving at Durban. They are part of the great army Britain is rapidly pouring into South Africa. Transport after transport from England, India, Australia, Canada, is coming in almost daily, laden with thousands of troops. The Gordon Highlanders, as already stated in previous issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, suffered severely in the recent engagements, and one famous Highland regiment, the "Black Watch," was almost wiped out at the battle of Magersfontein.

Still another photograph shows the Royal Artillery moving guns from a transport to a train of the Natal Railroad at Durban, preparatory to a rush to the front. It is now generally acknowledged that the Boer artillery is superior to that of the British. The burghers have the benefit of the services of expert French and German artillerists, and their "Long Toms" (as the long-range Krupp and Creuzot guns are called) have already made several of the British positions untenable. To offset this, the English have utilized some of the long-range naval guns from the warships. A fifth photograph shows the Manchester regiment, which was hurried to the front in Natal, just before the Boers issued their famous ultimatum, which was accepted as equivalent to a declaration of war. The Manchester regiment is now cooped up in Ladysmith, with the remainder of Gen. White's forces. A sad scene, amid so much that is full of life and action, is the photograph of the grave of Gen. Colley, who fell at Amajuba Hill, the Boers' most signal victory in the last war.

Old Age and Childhood in the Sunrise Kingdom

JAPAN is the paradise of childhood. There are a great many annual festivals in that sunny, flowery land, the most popular of all occurring about the New Year, and engaging the attention of everyone in the family, from grandparents to the baby. This holiday fete does not end with one day: it stretches over two entire weeks, and is really not quite over until the last of the month. The children are dressed in their prettiest clothes and wear them from morning until night; friends and relatives are coming and going, and there is a spirit of fun and jollity abroad, so that the sense of enjoyment never ceases. Toys and dolls are bestowed on the little folks, and cakes and sweets are abundant, while in the evenings, old and young play games and have a merry time. Then, sprinkled all through the year are the flower and fruit festivals; the cherry, the plum, the iris, or the chrysanthemum giving the motif for the brilliant scene. And in no other country of which I ever heard, is there a yearly Feast of Dolls, lasting three days. Miss Bacon, who spent some years in Japan, tells us that on the third day the great fire-proof storehouse yields up its treasures of dolls; in an old family, some of them hundreds of years old, and their tiny furnishings of lacquer, silver and porcelain, are all arranged on red-covered shelves in the finest room in the house. Many people have dolls dressed to represent the Emperor and Empress and the courtiers and musicians, just as if we were to dress dolls like the President and his wife.

THE dress of Japanese children is very comfortable and picturesque, and their freedom from reproof and scolding makes them very gentle and amiable. In Japanese houses one does not hear the perpetual "don't" of Western lands, and as there is little which children can injure, nobody is worried about mischief which may be done by small and meddlesome fingers.

Old women in the Sunrise Land enjoy a great deal of independence. So far from being ashamed of her age, an elderly dame in Japan takes pains to reveal it; the younger people wait on her, and she undertakes any light tasks she pleases, goes freely about the streets, and is cared for tenderly by her sons and daughters. Women age early in the Orient; at thirty-five a matron is in the sere and yellow leaf, so far as her beauty is concerned; she shrivels up, becomes lean and wrinkled, but, as a rule, remains smiling and good-tempered, and never forgets to be polite.

IN worn blue cotton clothes, with a burden on her back—flowers, fruit, vegetables, or whatever it may be—one often meets an old woman cheerfully trotting along, ready to sell her wares to any customer who will buy. Sometimes one finds her cutting the grass in a little garden and doing it with a pair of scissors. Whatever she does, she is serene, cheerful and contented.

Given these natural qualities, how lovely would the Japanese woman be, how fascinating the Japanese child, if, added to them were the high principles, steadfast faith, and unselfish love of the disciple of Christ! Little by little the light has been breaking through the pagan darkness of Japan. It may well be that the twentieth century will see the Sunrise Kingdom brought to Immanuel, and made His peculiar treasure.

White Days and a White World

Snow is most welcome to the young girl, who, like the very spirit of the season, with glowing cheeks and smiling eyes, seems incapable of fatigue. She has her skates, and can glide over the smooth surface of the pond, and, when her hands are cold, she is woodsman, or rather woman enough to light a little fire and thaw their icy tingle above its grateful warmth. I hope she remembers the birds, for many of them dare our Northern winters and would be glad of crumbs when the ground is frozen.

Dr. C. C. Abbott, describing a winter scene, says: "Even during bitterly cold days in our woods, there are birds and birds. As a proof of this, one need only mention crows and snowbirds; but I am not speaking ironically, but soberly, discreetly and cautiously, when I say that our woods, at least in midwinter, often contain as many species, usually even more individually, than in midsummer."

Dr. Abbott is speaking of Central New Jersey. My boys who belong to the Audubon Society, may send me the result of their observations, if they choose. How beautiful is winter, when the ice-fields glisten, and the dark boughs of the cedar lift their glorious tapering spires; when the moss clings close to the north side of the tree, and the holly berries shine on the branches. In winter, we see the architecture of the leafless trees. Some one has compared the forest branches when denuded, to the cordage and spars of a stately ship. There is life in the trees—very busily at work, too—and in the forests, in every nook and corner, there are sleeping forms of life; some to awaken.

God's in his heaven,
All's right with the world.

When the Almond Tree Shall Flourish

Two of our most honored readers, Mr. and Mrs. John Osburn, of Cadiz, Ohio, recently celebrated the sixty-third anniversary of their wedding. Both are hale and hearty and drive three miles to church every Sunday, and both have read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for fourteen years. Father Osburn is eighty-four and Mother Osburn is eighty-three, and sixty years have passed since, in their youth, together they united with the Presbyterian church. Of their ten children, eight are living, and all are in Christ's fold, as members of the church.

This is a beautiful life-record—a golden wedding thirteen years ago, and life still full of joy for the venerable pair.

Table Manners

Our habitual table manners are revelations of our home training. The careful parent begins the training of the child in the graceful use of the knife and fork and spoon, almost in babyhood. I sat at the table lately beside a wee maiden of two summers whose table behavior was perfect. She handled her spoon with the ease of a duchess. A child should be taught to eat soup from the side of the spoon, silently; to break off his bread in little pieces, not to spread a slice and bite it or tear it; of course nobody eats with a knife, or drinks from a saucer. Those customs obtained before silver forks were in common use, and when there was less leisure about meals than now, and persons could not wait to let tea and coffee cool. A spoon must not be permitted to stand in a cup. Knife and fork are laid across the platter when the meal is finished. If a child wishes to push some article of food upon his fork, he takes a bit of bread for the purpose. Bread must not be dipped in coffee or in gravy.

If one has a cold and must use a handkerchief, it is necessary to ask to be excused, and to leave the room, going out of sight and hearing. No polite person, child or adult, interrupts another in conversation at the table or elsewhere, and asides, giggling, and remarks upon the conduct of guests or elderly people are excessively ill-bred. Should you happen not to like some part of the food, leave it without remark, and never explain that it does not agree with you.

JAPANESE CHILDREN ON A FÊTE DAY

A MASQUERADE

A LITTLE old woman before me
Went slowly down the street,
Walking as if a-weary
Were her feeble, tottering feet.

From under her old poke-bonnet
I caught a gleam of snow,
And her waving cap-string floated
Like a pennon to and fro.

In the folds of her rusty mantle
Sudden her footsteps caught,
And I sprang, to keep her from falling
With a touch, as quick as thought.

When, under the old poke-bonnet,
I saw a winsome face,
Framed in with the flaxen ringlets
Of my wee daughter, Grace.

Mantle and cap together,
Dropped off at my very feet,
And there stood the little fairy
Beautiful, blushing, sweet.

Will it be like this, I wonder,
When at last we come to stand
On the golden, gleaming pavement
Of the blessed, blessed land?

Losing the rusty garments
We wore in the years of Time,
Shall our better selves spring backward
Serene in a youth sublime?

Instead of the shapes that hid us
And made us old and gray,
Shall we get our child hearts back again
With a brightness that will stay?

I thought—and my little daughter
Slipped her dimpled hand in mine,
"I was only playing," she whispered,
"That I was ninety-nine."

Good-night

In English households one sees on the hall table an array of bedroom candles, and as each person leaves the others for the night, he or she takes a candle to carry to the sleeping apartment. The soft "good-night," spoken by loving lips, is really a tender commendation of the loved one to the heavenly care. In the night, when sleep enfolds us and we drift to the unknown land of dreams, we are at the mercy of many apparent accidents; fire may come, or robbers or illness. Yet he who watches Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps, and so we may confidently seek our beds, saying "Good-night."

The Penny Saved

We should teach our children that the penny saved is the penny earned; and to this end, if we can possibly do so, we should give each boy and girl an allowance: three cents or five cents a week, if no more. City children can seldom resist the temptation to squander pennies when the candy shop stands on every corner, unless they have early been indoctrinated in the virtue of thrift. They should also be taught to save, that they may have the wherewithal to give; not merely persuaded to save, so that they may have a hoard in their little banks. Then we should let them know where their Sunday School money goes, what is done with it and the good it does.

"IT TAKES two to make a quarrel," says a pithy Spanish proverb worth remembering. "It takes two to make a quarrel; one can always end it." Do not forget this, when your temper is irritated. Be silent, and let the matter drop until you are calm. In contention, silence, if not cowardly, is usually the part of wisdom.

TABLE MANNERS should be slightly formal, yet full of ease. Do not have company manners; your very best are none too good for everyday use in your own home.

THE TOUCHSTONE

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

SUMMARY OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

The story is concerned with the fortunes of two brothers, Caryl and Douglas Lingard. They were reared and educated by a rich uncle, who at his death, left all his money to Caryl, the elder of the two. Douglas, the younger brother, could not understand being disinherited and was still more surprised at his brother accepting the whole estate, instead of dividing with him. He becomes a civil engineer, and, while superintending the construction of a railroad, lives in a country town, to which his brother comes as a candidate for election as member of Parliament. Previous to his brother's arrival he had made the acquaintance of Martin and Celia Hamerton, who were the son and daughter of the former squire of the village, who had ruined himself and left his two children slenderly provided for. Martin Hamerton eked out their income by literary work. He had been at school with the Lingards and had cordially welcomed Douglas to his home. Celia was beloved of all the parish and was a friend to every poor person in it. Douglas fell in love with her at first sight, but as he notices that his brother Caryl is also attracted to her, has little hope of the success of his suit. Caryl is staying with Mr. Allardyce, the gentleman who had purchased Squire Hamerton's estate, and, with his son Frank, was living in the squire's mansion. Another character in the village was Mrs. Locke, a cousin of the Lingards, who had been housekeeper to their uncle. She and the Hamertons and Mr. Allardyce had gone to a political meeting in the village, at which Caryl Lingard, as the candidate for election, had made a speech. At its close, in the dusk of the evening, some one called out to him: "Tell us what became of your old uncle's money." Caryl naturally supposed that his brother had been talking against him in the village and was incensed at his doing so.

CHAPTER X.
Guesses at Motives

WHO could have asked that disconcerting question at the political meeting? Who could there have been in that handful of villagers with the knowledge of the affairs of the Lingard brothers which was displayed in that question: "What became of your old uncle's fortune?" If it was a villager who put the question, then someone must have been gossiping with him. More than one person was thinking over that subject.

Celia was puzzling her active little brain about it. She was not walking home with Caryl, as Douglas feared. She walked between Mr. Allardyce and his son, and contrived so to distribute her attention as to keep them, nothing loth, by her side: thus rather compelling the others—her brother, Mr. Lingard and Mrs. Locke—to form another trio. When the party broke up, at the head of the lane that led to the Dower House, she slipped her hand under her brother's arm and fell suddenly silent—a sufficiently unusual state of things to move him presently to ask the reason of it. But she would not satisfy him until they were safely within the walls of their own home.

"Well, what is the matter?" asked Martin, smiling, as he flung himself into his own study chair, and Celia carefully closed the door and perched herself on the corner of the table before him. "What is this weighty business that cannot be stated in the open air?"

"Why, it seems even to myself like scandal—the most improbable, causeless scandal, that I am ashamed to repeat! But the more I think of it the more sure I am."

"Sure of what?"

"Martin, who do you think it was that put that question to Mr. Lingard?"

"I can't imagine. One of the lads, I suppose, though how one of them should know or think anything about it———"

"It was Mrs Locke!"

"Mrs. Locke! Impossible!"

"That is just what I feel, but all the same it was she. I know them all, every boy and man of the few who were in that room, and there is not one who would have put that question—not one who speaks like that, even. And besides, I happened to be watching her. A few minutes before she had turned down the lamp, saying something about its smoking, but it was not smoking. And she had turned it much too low, so that it gave hardly any light. She turned her face rather toward the wall, and held up her hand so as to hide the direction from which the voice came, but I know it was she who spoke. She waited till William Bennett had got up, so that everyone might be looking at him."

"But supposing that she dared to do such a thing—that she could hope to do it without being found out—what could be her motive?"

"Ah! that is what I want you to help me to find out. You are accustomed to judge of motives and probabilities, and you know the facts as well as I do."

Martin frowned thoughtfully, and drummed upon the table with his fingers.

"We may conclude," he said at last, "that the question was not put to please Caryl Lingard. And that is a puzzle, for I have always thought that Mrs. Locke was particularly desirous of pleasing him."

"Ah!" said Celia, "you have noticed that, have you?"

"I thought so. Well, it is pretty evident that if he was to be taunted on the subject of old Lingard's money, it must have been in the interests of his younger brother. Nothing has ever been said to me about it; but it is very plain to me that all the uncle's money has gone to Caryl, and it has seemed to me unfair. Is it possible that Mrs. Locke thinks so, too, and took this way of showing it?"

"No!" said Celia decidedly. "She cares for Caryl so much more than for the other that she would think it quite fair for him to have everything."

"True, O queen! That is the logic of your sex, for which we men have often occasion to thank Heaven. Moreover, if there was a person in that room to-night to whom that question was more annoying than to Lingard major, it was Lingard minor."

"I wish you would not call them by those stupid school names!" said Celia, with some irrelevance. "Mr. Douglas Lingard is, if anything, rather bigger than his elder brother. I believe I should make a better novel-writer than you, for you can't fathom that woman at all, and I believe I can."

"Go on, then. Interpret, and I will carp and criticise."

"Don't you see that she meant it to be supposed that it was one of the Brentwood people who spoke?—horrid treacherous creature! putting it off upon them, as though my county folks would do anything so ill-bred and interfering. And if it had been one of them, who could have told him anything about the matter? What would Mr. Lingard suppose but that his brother had been talking about his wrongs, if he has any, even to the village people? And if he had done so, how could they ever be friends again?"

"It does not seem likely to tend to a reconciliation, certainly."

"I have seen enough of village squabbles," went on Celia, with a sigh and a quaint little air of deep and sad knowledge of the world, "and I know that nothing makes them hopeless except when it appears that So-and-so has said something to somebody else outside the family. When that turns up I know I may as well leave off trying to make them friends again. And depend upon it, that woman knows it too."

"You think, then, that she did it in the hope of making an irreparable breach between the brothers? But that only puts the difficulty a stage further on, for why should she want to do so?"

"That is just what we don't know! But, Martin, I am not sure that it is not our duty to try and find out."

"Oh, what a thing is a woman's sense of duty! My dear, don't you know that there is no circumventing a female villain? especially when you can't guess what she is aiming at!"

"We do know what she is aiming at, only not what she wants it for. And if we know that much more than any one else does, it seems to make us responsible."

"I am sure I hope not, for if you are right Mrs. Locke is far too Machiavellian for me to cope with."

"Time will show. I don't think she is the kind of woman to be consistent in anything. But if she were to be allowed to make a hopeless feud between the two brothers, who have no one but each other in the world, it would be a triumph of darkness over light, of evil over good—and I don't believe it will happen."

While the brother and sister were thus discussing the matter, the young man most concerned, was also grappling with it.

If Douglas Lingard had been aware of how much Celia and her brother knew and understood he would probably at this time have come to them for sympathy, and have told them how matters stood between Caryl and himself.

But he had no means of knowing, and as a general thing he more than shared the feelings of Celia's village friends as to the unpardonableness of making family grievances public property. The incident at the meeting had annoyed him bitterly because he felt that to Caryl the only possible explanation of it must seem to be that he had set on some rustic acquaintance to put that question. And yet, when he had half resolved to write to Caryl and tell him that those words had been as much of a surprise to himself as to anybody, he altered his half-made-up mind again. "If he thinks I could do such a thing as that, what is the use of talking? why should he believe my word?" he said to himself.

Though, in the circumstances, to dine at the Hall was as much pain as pleasure, Douglas had naturally wondered how soon Mr. Allardyce would follow up his loudly-expressed hope that he should soon see his dear friend Lingard's brother under his roof again.

Judging by what the Hamertons had said of the good gentleman's exuberant hospitality, Douglas had supposed that another invitation might very shortly arrive, especially in these stirring times, when guests were being entertained at the Hall almost every night.

But none came, and he found himself wondering whether Caryl had said anything—hinted anything—whether Mr. Allardyce knew, in short, that it would be no pleasure to them to meet? And also, which was the real Caryl—the one who had pushed with him behind the tinker's cart and had called him by the old boyish pet name, the man who had talked to those few cottagers of the righteousness that exalteth a nation—or the man who should have been named Jacob the Supplanter?

"I will go and see the Hamertons," thought Douglas. "They were my friends first, at any rate, and for their friendship I will make a fight if need be."

So the next fine afternoon he went down to the Dower House, to find Martin Hamerton sitting in the garden; and they sat there for some time enjoying that amicable desultory argument that often goes on between men who like one another well enough to be confidential if they chose, but—unlike most women—do not feel on that account disposed for confidences.

The little tea-table stood in the shade near them, and when Celia appeared she brought the tea-pot with her, not troubling herself to apologize for the absence of the little maid, who was gone to see her friends.

She allowed Douglas to help her to adjust the legs of the table to the inequalities of the grass plot, and they fell into conversation about some books that Martin—at his sister's instigation probably—had lent to the young man. And Martin, thus released from the necessity of speech, relapsed into somewhat gloomy silence after a fashion that had grown upon him of late, and sat looking—as Celia presently told him—as though the plot of his latest novel would not work itself out properly, or the general election had, as threatened, had a paralyzing effect upon the publishing trade.

When presently he began to listen again to the talk of his sister and his friend, it was still upon books, with that indirect personal reference that makes such talk a pleasant way of betraying one's real self.

"I would not read it at all," Douglas was saying. "I saw that they were going to be ruined, and I declined to have my feelings harrowed. At best, all those details of a happy home life are rather too like 'looking at happiness with another man's eyes,' and when one knows it is a coming to a grand smash directly———"

"—But when the smash comes early in the book, things are bound to right themselves before the end," said Celia, from the height of a wider experience of novel-reading.

"Oh yes, and the hero and heroine live happy ever after. They must have their share of misfortune to make up the story, and I don't generally sympathize to an uncomfortable extent. It is only that particular misfortune, and the way it threatens beforehand like the sword of Damocles, that touches somehow too near the quick. One sees it coming, I think, too long beforehand."

"I know! When I read that book it set me speculating as to the solvency of every family in the neighborhood. Martin can tell you that I got quite anxious about Mr. Allardyce, he is so exactly the kind of man whose harmless pride, in novels, goes before that kind of fall."

"Allardyce is all right," said Martin, somewhat grimly, answering her half appeal. "He took care to put his pile out of reach of trade risks before he indulged in the luxury of turning country gentleman. It is only folks like ourselves who are ruined nowadays."

"Oh! we have had our share of ruin," said Celia comfortably, "and it did not hurt much—I have heard you say so yourself. And there is always the comfort of thinking that it can't happen again. 'He that is down need fear no fall.'"

Martin started a little, and looked keenly at her; and Douglas, who happened to be watching him, was rendered vaguely uncomfortable by his expression. Afterwards, when he recalled it, it seemed to him as though Celia's brother knew of some consequences of their "ruin," such as it was, of which she was not yet aware, and of which he did not like to tell her.

However that might be, Martin put his thoughts aside for the moment, and wished to know whether Celia felt herself justified in accelerating Mr. Allardyce's bankruptcy by all the expense in which she was involving him in connection with the school feast.

"That reminds me," said Celia promptly. "Have you yet been bidden to that function, Mr. Lingard?"

"I have no possible claim to have been bidden," said Douglas, "being neither teacher nor scholar."

"But I bid you; and I have carte blanche to ask any one I please. Do you think you could come?"

"Thank you; it is very good of you to ask me, but———"

"Oh! that is not the way in which to look upon it at all. I have designs upon you as a capable and responsible assistant, to help me to send up fire-balloons and organize sports, to keep the boys from quarreling or the girls from cheating. I am asking a favor, not offering one."

"Then that settles the matter. I will certainly be there, if you think there will be anything I can do to help you."

"Only too many things, I am afraid. Mr. Allardyce, as he is so fond of proclaiming, is too old, and his boy Frank too young; and as for Martin, I leave it to his conscience to say why he is no use at all."

"I go there to study human nature," said Martin sententiously. "The village child, when not interfered with, is a valuable epitome of the primitive emotions, but when drilled and bribed into good behavior it is worth no more than the rest of us overcivilized men and women. Consequently, I deprecate interference."

"Do you think, then, that the touchstone is always self-interest, and that it finds base metal in us all?" asked Douglas.

"It seems so," said Martin, not flippantly, but rather as though he was but half considering his own words.

"That is the kind of thing that men think clever, I suppose," said Celia trenchantly. "For my part, I always mistrust generalities, they are so easy! I believe that the touchstone is different for all of us, and what you may find out with it varies just as much—gold, very often, where you thought there was nothing but dross. All the same," she added, with a swift descent from the abstract to the concrete, "I am not going to have my children set to scramble for sweets this time!"

A Bitter Cry for Food

Missionaries in India Describe the Suffering of Starving Thousands, and Plead for Help

PLOWING WITH BUFFALOES IN INDIA

EVERY mail from India brings appeals more urgent than its predecessor, for help in relieving the suffering entailed by the famine. Heretofore there has been an interval of several years between famines. In the majority of instances nineteen years have elapsed after one famine before another came; but now, before the people have had time to recover from the appalling suffering of 1897 and 1898 the monsoon has again failed and the crops have withered. The grain dealers were quick to get information of the fact, and prompt to take advantage of it by raising their prices. Thus, before scarcity was really felt, the prices of food have mounted up and up until, now, they are at the famine rate. The poor native, disappointed of getting a crop from his little holding, having spent every available rupee in the seed which is now withered in the ground, goes to the bunyah, as the grain merchant is called, to buy food for his family and stares aghast at the small quantity offered him for his money. Already the heart-breaking sight of emaciated creatures, pitifully pleading for one handful of grain, is becoming familiar, and the converts at the missions are begging for relief. In this emergency the missionaries have no alternative but to appeal to the friends at home who helped them before.

Rev. R. A. Hume, American Board missionary at Ahmednagar, writes: "The famine is very sore in the land. The Government, always conservative in its estimates, reports that fully thirty million persons are now suffering. I should be surprised if the number is not greater. The magnitude of the calamity cannot be realized. The price of grain is now five measures for a rupee and I cannot remember its being higher during the previous famine. It is now a daily experience with us to have feeble women come to us declaring that they have no food, which their appearance confirms, and they acknowledge that they have not the strength to work. I have seen within the past few days young mothers with new-born children, who have not tasted food in several days. Children deserted by their parents who could not bear to see them die of hunger, have come to our house pathetically holding out their tiny hands. The missionaries are doing all in their power, but it is so little compared with the need. I do not ask for much, but I do ask for help that we may take care of the sick and that we may provide for the children. We are regarded as the representatives of Christ here, and we are followed by crowds who appeal to us to put in practice the principles that we have taught the people to believe are the essence of Christianity. In this district there are eight thousand persons who have been baptized and there are over eight hundred thousand non-Christians. What are we to do in the presence of such numbers? The help rendered us by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the former famine was invaluable; may we not look for further help? The need is very urgent. A single dollar would mean so much to some poor mother, or some starving child. If your readers could see the poor creatures in their despair, no word of mine would be necessary. A heart of stone would melt at the sight of such suffering as I have witnessed, but am powerless to relieve. For the sake of our dear Lord, who taught us to succor the poor, send us relief and he will surely reward you for all that you do."

Dr. P. B. Keskar, the Christian physician of Sholapur, writes: "I personally know the good work you did for my countrymen three years ago in the time of our great suffering. I have seen the tears of gratitude in the eyes of men and women as they have told me of the great American journal which sent them help when they were starving, and have heard them say that they owe their lives to you. I therefore write to you in our new crisis with confidence, assured that the motives which prompted your readers to save life before, are still potent with them, and will lead them to help again. In this city I daily see hundreds of emaciated people from the surrounding villages who have parted with every article of any value to buy food. They are almost naked, and their appearance gives indubitable proof to a doctor's eye, that they are near death by starvation. A very small sum given to each individual would keep them alive until they could reach one of the relief stations that the government is opening, or until they could obtain employment. But the small sum in each case becomes a large amount in the aggregate. We cannot raise such a sum; but if your readers would send us help, we should all be so glad to distribute it, and so save the people alive.

"I know the case of one family of eight, who for two weeks have subsisted on one small meal a day. The husband and father goes out every day and gathers grass. He works from early dawn until dark, and when he takes all the grass he has been able to gather and sells it, he receives one anna (two cents) for it, and with this he buys the food which forms the only meal his wife and their six children have in the twenty-four hours. How would one of your readers like to gladden that man's heart by dropping a nickel into his hand every night? What joy that one nickel would give in that straitened home! How the bright, hungry children would thank God for the extra food that nickel would buy! And the giver would be blessed. It is an opportunity one needs to see in order to appreciate."

Mrs. M. B. Fuller, who is laboring in Gujerat and Berar, describes the conditions there as already most painful, and as likely to grow worse from week to week until June next. Shortly before writing us, a little girl had been found in the river bed, who had been thrown there to end her suffering, as her parents had no food to give her. She was taken into the mission and fed, and speedily recovered her strength.

Miss Grace E. Wilder, of the Presbyterian Mission at Miraj in the Bombay Presidency, earnestly pleads for help to succor the women and children. One dollar, she says, will support a child for a month, and even a family may be kept alive on a few cents a day. "A lady in America writing to a missionary a little north of us, enclosed one dollar in her letter. She said: 'It is only a little gift, but you may have a use for it.' With that dollar a meal was provided for thirty-eight women and one child, all of whom were in urgent need of relief."

A singularly sad feature of this fearful distress, is, that unprincipled people in India are taking advantage of the straits of parents, to purchase the native children for immoral purposes. A father and mother utterly without funds received an offer of a rupee recently for their eldest daughter, a mere child of eleven years. The parents having no food for themselves or their other children, accepted the offer, and the girl was sold into a slavery worse than death that her family might have food for a few days. Such facts make the work that Ramabai is doing at her institutions at Poona and Khedgaon especially valuable. Many of the inmates who would thus have been sacrificed in the famine of three years ago, are now trained Christian girls, happy and hopeful under Ramabai's care. A photograph of a group of these girls has been sent us and is reproduced on this page.

In view of the gravity of the crisis and the imperative demand there is for immediate relief, the proprietor of this journal will gladly receive and forward to India any sums sent for the sufferers. The Interdenominational Committee of missionaries, on which Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Disciples, and Friends are all represented, will take charge of any funds forwarded, and being in India, with perfect knowledge of the needs of the various localities, will intelligently distribute all gifts. Bishop J. M. Thoburn is president of this council and Rev. E. S. Hume, the American Board's missionary at Bombay is secretary. This organization will be of immense service, because it will insure the money going to the districts which most need it, and will prevent gifts being duplicated. It also is valuable in having reports from missionaries of all denominations; so that in making appropriations from the fund, no denomination receives more than it needs for the fields that it occupies. The care and faithfulness displayed by its members in 1897 is a pledge for like fidelity now. No charge or deduction is made for expenses of distribution, the missionary committee giving their services freely, as they did in the former famine. Contributors may, therefore, rest assured, that every cent given to feed the starving people, will be applied to the purpose for which it is given.

RESCUED FAMINE GIRLS IN PANDITA RAMABAI'S INSTITUTION IN POONA, INDIA

A Tribute to Moody

During a recent sermon in the Jefferson Park Presbyterian Church, Chicago, Rev. Frank DeWitt Talmage took for his subject, "The Life of Dwight L. Moody." In the course of his remarks, he paid this glowing tribute to the great evangelist:

Mr. Moody, better than any other man of this generation, has surrounded himself with the mightiest Gospel geniuses of the time. The sweetest singers of the world have led his music. He has developed more Christian leaders, and put his impress upon the same, than any man of God since apostolic times. There have been just as great preachers as he, as great writers and organizers and pleaders, as profound students of the Bible; but, like George Washington in revolutionary times, as an all-round man, a developer, a commander-in-chief of Christian warfare, he to-day stands without a peer, head and shoulders above the lives of his contemporaries. There are thousands of us who would follow him blindly, and his slightest wish would be our law. I can never repay in this life the great debt of gratitude I owe to him. Outside of my own family, there is no one who has so much molded me and to whom I am more indebted than to him, at whose feet I am laying this sincere tribute of tender love. Perhaps, in answer to our prayers, God will let him again take up his magnificent work. If that be true and you and myself should be summoned to go first, then let me be one of the millions of immortals who will press down to the gates of the New Jerusalem to greet him. For, whether on earth or in heaven, I want to tell D. L. Moody he has made the Bible for me a new book; made my life purer, my hope happier; my faith a living reality; my Christ a companion; and my heaven a home.

Arguments From Temperance Advocates Favoring Acceptance

SLEEK Deacon Elder passed the plate
To Brewer Harmon, sitting straight
In his upholstered pew.
The brewer smiled and dropped a bill,
The deacon smiled and thought no ill:
"It's but the brewer's due.

Has he not heard the music bright
And listened to a shining light
In the best church in town?
Some one must pay for all this show;
His money's good as ours, you know;
And then it's paid right down."

The brewer smiled and nudged his wife
And whispered to her: "Bet your life
It pays to give in church!
I'll soon have Elder's Christian name
Upon my license—that's my game.
It pays to give in church."

The brewer's money looked the same
Upon the plate as that which came From Deacon Elder's purse.
And why not serve the Church's cause
As well as Elder's cash? It was No better and no worse.

The eyes of God look on that plate—
Look not at number nor at weight,
But motives back of all;
The widow's mite he quickly sifts
From Harmon's, Jones', and Elder's gifts;
On it his blessings fall.

Pasadena, Cal. —G. S. H.

THE letters which we give below, although written by correspondents who desire the abolition of the saloon, give various reasons and conditions which, in the writers' minds, justify the church's acceptance of the saloon-keeper's money. In a later issue, we will give an equally strong array of correspondents who answer with an unqualified "No!" the all-absorbing question: "Shall the church accept the saloon-keeper's money in aid of its spiritual work?"

The Master Did Not Discriminate The evangelization of the world is by the children of the King mingling among the children of Sin, and Christ prayed "Keep them from the evil." The life of our Saviour was spent among publicans and sinners. He talked with the woman at the well. He called the publican. He found and saved me, and when his messengers ask and receive from saloon-keepers or other rebels a gift for some Christian cause, the wedge is entered; put in the lever of prayer and God only can estimate the result that may follow. Surely the sin does not cling to the money. Take it and transfer it to the service of our God, to whom it and the sinner belong. J. N. Y.
Birwyn, Ill.

Case in a Frontier Town Circumstances placed myself and friend in the forest. The railroad came and with it a town sprang into existence, filled with the usual class of men that aid in building our roads. Later came the "lumber jack." There was a demand for liquor. The demand was met. Nearly all the families of the town are, through relatives if not directly, in some way engaged in the liquor traffic. My friend and I organized a Sunday School. Later we were two of seven members to organize a church. We have had regular services with varying attendance. Funds used come from collections and socials, which latter are well attended. Our minister is supported by saloon people. I am rabid on the temperance question, but under the circumstances have not questioned but that it was right in this case to receive the proffered aid. J. N. K.

A Novel Proposition Yes; for the following purpose: It is with difficulty that keepers of licensed drink-places — some called hotels — procure signers to petitions for the license. Besides, some judges have a conscience. If churches would combine and make a rule to take all money offered by licensed people, and expend it putting forth a protest to be mailed to all judges and to all signers of petitions for license, we believe an effective influence would be exerted against the traffic. Ignorance has much to do with this license business. We might err as much as others if in the same darkness, ignorance or misapprehension. J. F.
Gladstone, N. J.

Reject the Drinker's also It strikes me that it might be in order to change this question to: "Shall the wine-drinker's money be accepted by the church?" The saloon-keeper would have no money to give if his tills were not fed from the wine-drinker's purse. If we reject the dram-keeper's money, we must, to be consistent, reject the dram-drinker's. Mrs. E. B. P.
Norfolk, Conn.

Afraid to Refuse It If I were offered money by a saloon-keeper for the church, I would be afraid not to accept it. I could not know his motive and I would be afraid to judge him, as we are commanded not to judge. Who knows but that this is his first step towards quitting his evil ways? I think I would take his donation and ask God to convict and convert him. A. H. R.

Saloon-Keeper Not Alone Responsible A saloon speaks not for its keeper alone, but for the community. If the majority of voters did not sanction its existence, and if the neighborhood did not patronize it, it would not stand. Can we cast the sins of half our people on the saloon-keeper and make a scapegoat of him? Let these words ring in our ears: "Except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish." In regard to hush-money, if a church is built on so weak a foundation that it can be bribed or moved by the saloon-keeper's paltry pence, had not its "candlestick" as well be removed?
Potter Hollow, N. Y. E. D. C.

An Interesting Supposition I will suppose a case: Three men enter a restaurant. One orders a plate of oysters and a glass of wine, the other a dish of cheese and a glass of beer, and the third a bowl of bread and milk. After the meal one steps to the counter to pay the bill. The proprietor says: "I notice your people are to have a church sociable; keep this money and hand it to your wife and let her give it to the treasurer." On Sunday next, the saloon-keeper's wife attends church and deposits fifty cents in the basket, and her little daughter puts a dime into the Sunday School treasury. Now, who is the person that would refuse or reject these various gifts? Bear in mind that a saloonman's income is not always derived entirely from the sale of intoxicants. Where will you draw the line between so-called clean and unclean money? Let churches and Christian bodies of whatever name or creed, accept all the money they can get, and I am sure they will put it to good use—and when they get it all, they will have none too much. Money is only a commercial commodity—a circulating medium which loses its identity as it passes from hand to hand, and therefore cannot be tainted by theft, fraud, or crime.
Cortland, N. Y. J. G. M.

As a Legacy If the proffered gift comes as a legacy or bequest, and there is evidence that the donor regretted having been engaged in the business in which his wealth was accumulated; then I say the giver is not to be judged as a saloon-keeper, but a repentant sinner, whom the Lord himself is pledged to receive, and that his gift to the church is really and truly a restitution to the people, administered we may say, through the instrumentality of the church.
Norfolk, Mass. L. E. W.

If God Prompts the Gift If the Lord prompts Satan to give a portion of his ill-gotten lucre "for church and missionary purposes," accept it graciously, and close the exercises with the doxology, as a reminder that the Lord Omnipotent reigneth, and that retributive justice awaits the transgressor in due time, in strict accordance with the Divine economy. READER.

How a Tabernacle was Built It was a warm August Sunday evening as I sat on the piazza of an Iowa hotel. A Salvation Army captain stepped up on the porch where twenty traveling men sat, and asked each for a contribution. "Are you going to give the lady a coin?" I asked of a fine-appearing gentleman at my right. "Sure," he replied. "Do you know we Jews bought and paid for a fine tabernacle for the use of these people, down in ——, some time ago?" "Yes," I replied, "I heard of it." "God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform": and God moved our Hebrew brethren to do this act. God, too, moves saloon-keepers to give to his cause. We have no right to reject the saloon-keeper's money. Take it! use it! That's just what Christ would do. Did he refuse the water at the well? No. Was it drawn by the hand of a sinner? Yes. Don't let the devil take advantage of you by exciting your prejudice against the use of this money.
J. W. Roe,
Cedar Rapids, Ia. State Deputy Modern Brotherhood of America.

The Case of Vassar College If I mistake not, Vassar College is founded on rum money, Mr. Vassar being a brewer. Still, Mr. Vassar's money serves a good purpose. So, in the church accept all the money the makers and dealers in rum will contribute.
Philadelphia. W. T. T.

Rejection an Unwise Course In passing the plate for general contributions, each Sabbath in the church, would you withdraw the plate from a saloon-keeper and reject his contribution if he wished to give? Would we not consider such a course an insulting and unwise one? If we accept his money in such a case and under these circumstances should we not in others? Did not heathen tribes pay tribute to the Children of Israel, and was not this money put into the general fund of the nation to pay for religious sacrifices? Is it not reasonable that all means should be used to reclaim the rumseller? Who knows but the same money which the saloon-keeper is contributing, will in some way be the means of saving his soul and the souls of his children? Take all the money the saloon-keeper will give and use it for the furtherance of the cause of Christ. S. P. Kane.
Friend, Scott Co., Kan.

A Sweeping Exclusion I do not believe that the church has the right to deny any person the privilege of contributing money, or giving any other aid to help carry on the Lord's work. If it is wrong for the church to accept the saloon-keeper's money, then it is wrong to accept money from those who manufacture the liquor, or from those who by their act or failure to act legalize the traffic; or from any worldly sinner or hypocrite. I believe it is right for the church to accept the saloon-keeper's money, but the acceptance should not be permitted to act as a bribe, or prevent the church from discountenancing the liquor traffic. C. E. C.

Drinkers Responsible for Saloons It is not more cursed than any money obtained through the suffering of our fellows. Is not the man who wastes his earnings at saloons responsible for the existence of saloons and saloon money? He knows his family needs it, and God gave him will power if he will only use it. If saloon money is tainted so is drug-store money.
Kennebunk Port, Me. C. P. T.

Refuse the Druggist's Gift If we refuse the saloon-keeper's money, we must refuse the druggist's also.
Los Angeles, Cal. Mrs. M. J. S.

Saloon Money the Church's Money The saloon-keeper's money is the church members' money transferred, for the saloon could not exist save by consent and support of church members who make our voting majority. How can the church refuse this money as tainted and accept that of her members by whose favor the saloon lives?
Losantville, Ind. Oscar S. Hunt.

Nothing to do With the Contribution Box This question has nothing to do with money given at public collections in mixed multitude, where saloon-keepers, their families, gamblers, or other evil-doers throw gifts into the contribution box. No one questions their right to attend church and to give. But to receive money or solicit from saloon-keepers, robbers or gamblers is most assuredly contrary to the Word of God. J. M. M.
St. Helena, Calif.

Accept Offerings; Solicit More Receive all the money saloon-keepers will give and solicit more. Appoint a committee to receive it, and notify each saloon-keeper that you will become his almoner and distribute his gifts faithfully among his victims, especially in burying his dead.
Grand Bay, Ala. D. DeVol.

DOCTOR'S PROPHECY.

About Grape Nuts.

Dr. J. H. Hanaford, one of the oldest physicians in Reading, Mass., says in the Practical Age: "I firmly believe that Mr. Post has rendered a greater service to humanity than any other man living, in the matter of food.

"He claims, with propriety, I think, that his new food, Grape Nuts, made from the most nourishing elements of the grains, contains nourishment in one pound equal to ten of meat, wheat, oats or bread.

"From the acquaintance that I have had with this unusually nutritious article, I am satisfied the statement is truthful and demonstratable. I am inclined to believe the food will effect considerable of a revolution in society, to the extent that it is introduced."

This was written by Dr. Hanaford several months ago. The rapid spread of the use of Grape-Nuts all over the country has demonstrated that the doctor's prophecy has already come true, to an extent, at least. Perhaps never before in the history of food manufacture has such rapid progress been made as with Grape-Nuts. It especially appeals to brain-workers.

All first-class grocers furnish Grape-Nuts, and the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., are the makers.

Bishop Taylor on the Boer War

PROBABLY no American now living has had as long and varied an experience in Africa as the venerable ex-Bishop William Taylor, for many years the head of the Methodist Missions in the Dark Continent. Bishop Taylor is passing the closing years of his busy life in partial retirement with his family at Palo Alto, Cal., enjoying excellent health, although his great age prevents him from continuing active service in the Gospel field. Being requested to give his views on the present condition of affairs in South Africa for the benefit of the readers of this journal, he said: "British supervision has for sixteen years ministered to the prosperity of Egypt. Her revenues have increased and her methods of government have been entirely reconstructed and patterned after the best form known to nineteenth century civilization. She has regained her lost provinces in the Soudan. I can see in the future an Egypt independent of Turkey, ranking among the second-class powers of the world, governing in peace the millions at home.

"South Africa is at present the world's chief source of supply for the splendid gems which the wealthy prize, the needy covet, and the lovers of the beautiful admire the world over. The diamonds of Hindustan and Brazil were the ideal gems before Kimberley dazzled the world with the fabulous wealth of the new Golconda. The great diamond mines of South Africa are situated within a circle of about three and one-half miles in diameter. There are five principal mines, the largest of which is forty-five acres in extent. These are known as the Kimberley, Bloemfontein, De Beers, Du Toit's Pan, and Wesselton mines. It is in this vicinity that the famous town of Kimberley has sprung up, where diamond mining is carried on in a way never before dreamed of.

"It is impossible for the outside world to gather the exact facts regarding the quantity of diamonds discovered in these mines. Doubtless the world would be amazed if the truth were known. The directors, however, keep the matter a profound secret, and, moreover, they place a decided limit to the output, lest the market should be glutted. It had been whispered by good authority that up to the end of 1892 no less than ten tons of diamonds had been taken from the mines. Regarding the present war, I would simply say that the best thing that could happen would be the resolving of the different states into one republic, under British protection. This would be best not only for the peace and civilization of the land and its people, but would be the means of extending the Gospel without restriction and with more protection than is enjoyed at present."

During his many evangelistic tours in South Africa the Bishop has visited all the chief cities and towns of Natal, Cape Colony, the Transvaal and Orange Free State. One of his very latest journeys was through the two Dutch Republics. He described, with much interest, his trip from Cape Town by rail to Johannesburg: over the great karroo, or desert, strewn with boulders, across the Orange River, and through the great grazing fields of the Free State to Bloemfontein, the capital. Another night of railway travel brought him to the Witwatersrand district—the richest gold mining section on the globe. "We were due in Johannesburg late Saturday night, but did not arrive until three o'clock Sabbath afternoon, and I preached the same evening to a large congregation. The village of tents of ten years previous had become a city, with a population of one hundred and sixty-two thousand. There were some beautiful and substantial squares near the centre; but for the most part the houses were constructed of corrugated iron. The abodes of the large native population were curiously combined of timber, iron, stone, and brick. This was a barren spot when the mining camp took possession of it, but the English miners planted eucalyptus and weeping willow, which now afford shade from the hot sun and rest to the eye, and have completely transformed the scene. From Johannesburg I went by rail to Pretoria, which is a beautiful town, with comfortable cottages, clean streets shaded by tall trees and lined with rivulets.

"The presidential mansion at Pretoria is an unpretentious cottage on a quiet street, where President Kruger himself can be seen seated on the veranda, while an artilleryman stands guard at the gate. 'Oom Paul' speaks English well, and is a plain man, who has family prayers every morning at six o'clock, and preaches a good sermon to his people every Sabbath. That evening I preached in the chapel of the South Africa General Mission and twenty blacks came forward to the altar as seekers of salvation. Just then the curfew sounded, and my black penitents went scampering homeward. The law requires every native to be at home by half-past eight o'clock."

He had a personal interview with President Kruger, and was kindly received. Later, he visited the Boer Senate at the Capitol. Regarding the antagonism of the Dutch and English races, the Bishop says: "Years do not seem to modify, but rather to intensify the incompatibility. Of late years, the feeling has been even more hostile. The South African Bond (Boer) and the South African League (British) represent the extremes of this race feeling. Imperial supremacy is an altogether different thing, and not worth considering. What is important, however, is that it will be of a character to insure the largest possible civil and religious liberty to the people of South Africa. If the British are in the ascendant, the principles which triumphed in the United States, Canada, and the Australias will triumph there also; if the Dutch gain the ascendancy, the outlook is not so bright. In my opinion, the latter can scarcely be the case, though at present Boer ideas and views preponderate. If a happy solution of the problem be arrived at, South Africa, a hundred years hence must have a population of European descent approaching 8,000,000, and a colored population of 16,000,000."

Our Dearest Friend

MANY are life's troubles
Many are its cares;
But I have a Saviour
Who my trouble shares;
When my burden's heavy,
Jesus thinks of me,
And he's always ready
Help and strength to be.

Many are my sorrows,
Oft my heart must break;
It is then my Saviour
Will my sorrows take;
It is then he comforts,
Brings to me sweet cheer,
And when sad and lonely,
Always draws so near.

He's the friend who loves you,
He will hear your prayer;
Then in time of trouble
He is sure to care;
Then when sad and lonely,
Bowed with care or grief,
Always go to Jesus,
He will give relief.

Land Titles in Cuba

THE system of land transfers in Cuba is in many respects like the Australian or Torrens system, which has been introduced into a few of the States of the Union. The records are kept in the department known as the Registries of Property. There are twenty-five of these registries in the island, corresponding closely with the judicial districts, and located in the towns which are the heads of the judicial districts. The registrars of property are appointed by the superior authority. They correspond to the recorders of deeds in American municipalities.

The title to landed property sold by one private person to another, passes on the execution of the public writing or deed, made before a Notary Public and signed by the contracting parties, attested by the Notary Public. The following steps have to be taken in such sales and in the registration of the titles:

1. The legal status of the property is ascertained from the Registry of Property.

2. A certificate of title, either literal or by report, can be obtained from the Registrar, on his responsibility and under his bond. This certificate will aid the Notary to know and make known to the contracting parties the status of the title and to assure them as to whether title to the property can be registered.

3. The deed is now executed before the Notary and signed by the contracting parties and attested by the Notary.

4. Copy of the deed is now taken to the Registrar of Property in his character as representative of the Treasury, for his valuation of the property for the taxes which must be paid on the contract according to the legal tariff.

5. A copy of the deed is now taken to the Treasury with the assessment made by the Registrar of Property for the approval of the assessment and payment of the taxes. The Treasury gives to the owner on payment of the taxes another receipt or certificate of payment.

6. The copy of the deed, with the certificate of payment, is taken to the Registrar of Property in order to have it registered. The Registrar thereupon registers the receipt of the document in the book of daily operations, with the hour and date, which is good for thirty days or sixty days, in case of suspension or denial of registration.

7. The Registrar of Property examines the title with a view of recording it, notifying the party as to defects; and, if registration is allowed, then within the prescribed period, duly records the document under a property number, signing the note of record with his full signature. This completes the official certification.

Under Spanish law, the Notary Public is a far different individual than in the United States. His functions are more formal and distinct. The number of notaries is limited. In their character they are something like United States Commissioners. It should also be noted that the Notary is responsible for any error in the title which he may pass, and damages may be recovered from him for such errors. This makes the Notary very scrupulous in seeing that there is no possible flaw in the title for which he becomes responsible. The deed itself is the act of the Notary rather than of the parties to the transaction which the deed witnesses. The Notary retains the original instrument in his records, which are to that extent public records. The parties to the instrument receive such certified copies made by the Notary as they may see fit to ask and pay for.

All liens and incumbrances and all contracts affecting real property are recorded in the office of the Registrar of Property, along with the title to such real property. The record in the Registrar's office is a record not of conveyances alone, but of the titles resulting from such conveyances. The certificate of the Registrar as to the title of any piece of real property can be had on application by any inquirer, and such certificate is deemed to be conclusive.

Under the American military authority, no changes have been made in the system of land titles and transfers. While it is somewhat cumbersome, the effect has been to give greater security to land transfers. Where so many formalities had to be carried out, there was little chance for the conveyance of a clouded title. Under the Spanish laws, litigation over the title to landed property has been rare.

In the Far Country

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Jan. 14. Luke 15 : 11-24

HOW many lost men have been encouraged to make a new start in life by this parable of the Prodigal Son. To a man alienated from God, depressed in spirit and suffering in fortune, the assurance that Christ practically gives of forgiveness and welcome, comes with power. He knows that he is miserable; he knows that he has been foolish, as well as wicked, and he is sorry. But what then? If he returns and humiliates himself, will he be any better off? Perhaps his father will say: "You chose your own course; you took your own way; now you must bear the consequences of your own acts." He would rather not go back than go back to meet a repulse. The question of returning turns on his estimate of his father's love. Has his father expelled him from his heart? Or does he still love him, in spite of his misconduct? That is a matter which the son cannot tell. He does not know how his father may act. But he remembers his father's past kindness; he knows something of his father's character, and he thinks there is a chance, if not of full forgiveness, at least of such favor as is shown, in his father's house, to servants. So he makes the venture. This is the question which Christ settles for us as to God. He gives the assurance that the son needed, in the far country—the assurance that God loves his erring child and will give him welcome.

Among the other lessons that the parable teaches, besides this supreme one of God's long-suffering love, is that of perpetual sonship. The son is a son still, while he is in the far country. A bad, wicked son; but still a son. Men need to learn this lesson. They belong to the highest rank in creation and they are too precious to throw themselves away. They discover this, when they "come to themselves," as Christ significantly phrases it. Though they have degraded themselves and disgraced themselves, they may claim sonship still; even though conscience compels them to add, "no more worthy to be called thy son." And God recognizes the relationship, which is the all-important fact. The wanderer is not received on probation, nor on good behavior; but received at once as a son. It is difficult for some degraded sot, some crime-steeped villain, to realize the fact, or for some other to realize it in him; but it is a fact, and he has only to go to God confessing his sin and his unworthiness to find that the claim holds good. Then, how the lowness of motive is overlooked! The wandering lad is not drawn home by his love of his father, or by concern about his father's distress; but by his longing for decent food. There is plenty in his father's house. Even the servants have enough and to spare. He will go back lest he perish with hunger. But all this does not tell against him with the father. He is glad to get his son back on any terms, so long as he is sorry and admits his folly. God has received many sons on those terms. They have wandered; their motives are still sordid; but when they come, they are welcomed.

As if to leave nothing unsaid which could point the lesson, Christ amplifies the details. The wandering son does not have to reach his father's house and apply for admission. "When he was yet a great way off, his father saw him and had compassion on him," and ran to meet him. He was coming home—coming voluntarily—and that was enough. The father understood that his son's mind must be changed. God does not leave the repentant sinner in doubt about his welcome. If he will only quit his sin and come back with words of repentance on his tongue, there are no questions asked. It is no half-forgiveness.

Then his appearance is quickly changed. Christ wishes his hearers to understand that the status of the repentant prodigal is at once established. His rags, smelling of the swine, are removed; and he is clothed as befits a son of the house. "I am not fit" is the reply the sinner makes when he is urged to come to God. That is true, and the prodigal owned it; but the father proceeds to give him the outward evidence of sonship. God does more than that. When the sinner returns, with the confession of unworthiness on his lips, God gives him the spirit of a son. He takes his place at his Father's table, with filial love and respect. That lad will never wander more. His elder brother might yield to temptation, but nothing will ever induce the forgiven prodigal to repeat his offence. He is a son forever and will go no more out.

To Work for Christ in India

MISS EMMA L. KNOWLES, an American Missionary, sailed for India, December 20, to resume work under the auspices of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. Before leaving New York she received word that the Indian home government had granted a tract of land for the rebuilding of the Mission school destroyed at Darjeeling in the Himalaya mountains during the frightful storm of September last. The disaster has been turned by a kind providence into a positive blessing. The natives were given an object-lesson in heroism by the mission workers. The school which they worked so hard to establish was situated upon a lofty mountain slope, twenty hours by rail from Calcutta, and 7,000 feet above the sea. In the awful torrent which the storm sent down the mountain side on the third night, the mission building was rendered insecure. The resident teacher was afraid to put the thirty children to bed as usual, fearful of landslides. At ten o'clock that night she gathered them for a trip up the steep hillside to the nearest house, the storm threatening at every step to engulf them. The trip was made in safety and not a moment too soon, for the foundations were washed away from the building they abandoned, leaving the house itself trembling on the edge of a deep gully. In the upper house they were given shelter, the children being given the sleeping apartments. One of the latter was occupied by the six children of Mr. and Mrs. Lee, missionaries from Ohio. The sad story of the death of those little ones has already been told in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

MISS EMMA L. KNOWLES

Next day the storm lessened in intensity, after causing havoc to life and property in that region. Mr. and Mrs. Lee were sent for. They arrived three days later with their one remaining child, an infant nine months old. One of the six children lived long enough after their arrival to tell them the pathetic story of that midnight tragedy. Then he, too, died and was laid away to rest beside his brothers and sisters. The parents, crushed as they were, gleaned some sweet comfort from his recital.

Miss Knowles had not intended returning to India at this time, but in response to the new call and the new interest awakened in the work she can no longer remain.

Whittier, Farm Lad and Quaker Poet*

WHITTIER as a lad was tall, but not over-strong, with large eyes, deep set in their orbits and full of expression. Those es never ceased to challenge attention, d could of themselves question one make reply. His boyish experience ght him of all farm labors; he could lk the cows or fell trees or cradle in. His school opportunities were all, but he grappled them with rare sistence. The strong Quaker strain of od in him brought with it a love for aightforwardness, for plainness and plicity of speech and conduct, which never outgrew: but—what was more ely a product of Quakerism—there was rn in him an instinct for rhyme and etic illuminations of thought, which oke out of him as easily as the dapples sun and shadow broke upon the Powow ver. He was humane, too: Burns' d-mouse touched him as tenderly as e Scotsman's rhythm; all suffering ngs and all captives made quick appeal him, and he wreaked their woes in les that always carried flavors of New gland woods and waters.

Some of these lines catch the attention Garrison, the arch-agitator, only two three years his senior, who goes to it him among his cows—and gives to m the earliest of those encouragements ich pave the way to an ardent and life-g friendship. The Quaker farm-boy earnest to multiply all helps for a better hooling—has also his shoemaking ex-rience, in which the measured beat on the lap-stone is balanced and htened by a beat of trochaic measure d song. There is apprenticeship, more-er, to the printing craft; but the "com-sing-stick" in his hand always lags be-hd the composing-stick in his thoughts. s work is known and welcomed in all e local journals; it has wandered even far as Hartford, where that wit, George Prentice—in those days managing the w England Review—has pounced on the Quaker poet as a good succes-r to himself, when he files away to ter upon his Kentucky career.

In 1830-31, therefore, Whittier is virtual itor of that Hartford weekly; and I can call distinctly how, in those years (when e present writer was a fledgling pupil a country school, fifteen miles away m the tidy Connecticut capital), there s a close fingering of the goods—rnals, raisins, and candies—which an nerant huckster brought every Satur-y afternoon into the school-yard—for a ssible story or poem by "J. G. W."! year or two later, we find Whittier re-ned to his old home, shouldering up e industrial exigencies of the farm—his ther being dead—but still illuminating e newspaper columns with the bright tcome of his wakeful muse.

After 1836, he betakes himself to a vil-ge home in Amesbury (the ancestral rm being sold), and there—not so far ay to forbid companionship with the lls and brooks which had made rejoic-gs for his boyhood—he kept and guarded s kindly bachelor serenity in a home hich was brightened for many and many year by the feminine graces and uncon-erable cheer and courage of his young-sister.

But we must leave this New England aster of the deep-set eyes; and in leav-g, I make a threefold summing up of e big virtues that belonged to this man d to his work: First, his humanities; ways ready to lift that clear, honest ice of his to the chorus where there was anting in furtherance of humane enter-ise, or in honor of humane workers—hether living or dead—and always gen-ous to the full limit of his means; ways ready with a sharp note of distrust against organized schemes for the ag-grandizement of wealth—against wealth itself even, except it came only to flow out again in beneficent streams of well-doing and kindly helpfulness. Again, there belonged to this singer broad and earnest religious thought: clear, simple, and suffi-cient, with no crevices where the acrid juices of sectarianism could put in their work. The great vital truths are set firmly in his jeweled verse; while the lesser ones, about which doctors and presbyters everlastingly wrangle, drift down the wind—even as chaff scuds away where grain is winnowed.

The Sailor's Wife*

ROSE made no pretense of disguising her pleasure at my return; and her welcome—the first I had ever known—repaid me a thousand times for all I had gone through. When I sailed again I left a tearful, anxious wife behind. I was growing discontented with sea life. It was becoming harder and harder to part with my wife. She feared I would be drowned or killed. And I, who had never dreamed of such a thing as danger, began to reckon up the chances. I had almost decided to quit when I was pro-moted to the mate's berth. This put an entirely new face on the matter, for I could not hope to get a job ashore that would pay me as well as that. Rose said she didn't care, she wanted me. It was an uphill job to bring the little woman to my way of thinking, but she was far too good a wife to oppose her husband and make the performance of his duty hard. When I left New York on my second voyage as mate I carried with me a vision of a wee mass of dimples, fists, and feet esconsced in his fond mother's arms. Harder than ever Rose clung around my neck: and it was the hardest thing I ever did to untwine those loving arms: but telling her the boy would comfort her I reluctantly—choking back the unmanly tears—parted from that true heart forever. I received a letter in Liverpool: Rose was not strong it said. I was sad all the passage home. Ned (Rose's brother) boarded the ship at Quarantine. I was surprised: he should have been at work. There was a crape band around his hat, but I was such an utter barbarian that I did not know its significance.

"Why, hello, Ned!" said I. "What brings you here?"

He came to me slowly, took my hand in both of his, and said: "Peter, ol' man, it's hard. I'm sorry for ye, but it's God's will."

My heart sank. I became dizzy—almost blind. I asked:

"What is it? What's the matter? How is Rose?"

"Rose is dead and buried this ten days." Things swam about me, and there was a buzzing. I was aware of some one calling my name. "Mr. Stet-son, do you hear me?"

I saw Captain Tasker looking at me. He looked strangely big and indistinct.

"There comes our tug, sir: man the windlass!" said he.

The overpowering habit of obedience partially restored my senses. "Ay, ay, sir," I replied and started forward.

Closing Prayer at the Moody Funeral in the Congregational Church, East Northfield, Mass., where the Body Lay in State

His Funeral At Northfield

A Nation Mourns for Moody

The Occasion of a Great Demonstration

Thousands Attend the Services and Listen to the Eloquent Eulogies by Distinguished Christian Leaders—

A Last Look at the Dead—Simple Ceremonies at the Grave on Round Top

BENEATH the sod of tree-crowned Round Top, in East Northfield, the graceful mound from whose summit he has so often delivered the precious invitation of that Gospel he loved so well, lies all that is mortal of Dwight L. Moody. On Tuesday, December 26, with simple yet solemn ceremonial, and amid many manifestations of grief, the body of the century's greatest evangelist was committed to the grave, to await the resurrection.

The day of the funeral opened clear and cold, with a bright sun somewhat tempering the keen December air. Preparations had been made for an early service at the Moody home to precede the removal of the body to the church, where it was to lie in state for several hours before the public funeral. Accordingly, the service was held at 9 A.M., only the immediate family and relatives and a few intimate friends and associates of the deceased being present. Rev. Dr. C. I. Scofield read selections from the Scriptures, and Rev. Dr. R. A. Torrey of the Chicago Bible Institute offered prayer. Friends then viewed the body, after which the family were for a short time left alone with their beloved dead. When they had retired, the remains were placed in a casket of simple design, black-covered and open at full length. This was laid upon an oblong bier, heavily draped in black, which was carried to the church by thirty-two stalwart, young Northfield students, divided into four relays of eight each. As they were about to raise the bier to their shoulders, Mr. Fitt — Mr. Moody's son-in-law—sprinkled white roses about the casket.

The Cortege to the Church

Drs. Scofield and Torrey led the procession, which left the Moody residence at 10.30 A.M. Immediately behind the bier, walking by twos, came these honorary pall-bearers: Ira D. Sankey and George C. Stebbins, R. C. Morse and D. W. McWilliams, Rev. W. J. Herdman and Rev. Dr. George C. Needham. As the cortege moved from the house, the dead evangelist's eldest son, who stood bareheaded on the lawn, gave way to his grief, and leaned up against a tree, while his frame shook with emotion.

On the Congregational church being reached, the body was placed in front of the pulpit and the casket lid removed. Then followed a remarkable scene, lasting several hours, and showing more than words could express the wonderful hold the great evangelist had upon the hearts of the people. From far and near, in carriages and afoot, came hundreds to attend the funeral and pay the last tribute to him who had been their spiritual monitor for nearly a lifetime.

It is estimated that there were probably not less than three thousand persons in and around the building during the services. Professors from the Northfield schools stood at either end of the casket, and the throng of mourners filed slowly past, reverentially viewing the face of the dead. The features were calm and showed no evidence of suffering. Mr. Moody lay like one in a peaceful slumber. He was clad in his accustomed dress, and the lips seemed as if about to speak to the sorrowing multitude.

A little after 2 P. M. the doors of the church were closed to permit of the final preparations for the public service. Very simple were the floral decorations in the church. The galleries were trimmed with evergreens, and several fragrant tributes lay beside the coffin. At the head of the casket was a pillow of green with a crown of white roses interwoven, and a purple ribbon across the whole, on which were Mr. Moody's last words, "God is calling me." At the foot of the casket was a floral design of the open Bible, the left-hand page with the inwrought words, "Victory. I. Cor. 15: 56-57" and the opposite page, "II. Tim. 4: 7-8." There were wreaths of palm and of laurel, sprays of roses and sheaves of wheat, all gifts from the teachers and pupils of the Moody Institutes and from dear friends. An occasional ray of the clear, white winter sunlight stealing in through the church windows gave an added beauty to the fragrant offerings.

THE REMAINS LYING IN STATE IN THE CHURCH

A Vast Audience of Mourners

At 2.15 the family left the Moody residence, and on reaching the church Mrs. Moody, escorted by her eldest son, Will R. Moody, was the first to enter. Then came Mrs. Fitt, attended by her brother, Paul Moody, Mrs. W. R. Moody and Mr. Fitt and the other members of the household. In the centre of the church, seats had been reserved for the family and relatives, and immediately behind them were the members of the various Northfield and Chicago institutions founded by Mr. Moody. At one side of the platform were seated the young women of the Northfield Seminary and on the other side the young men, the relatives sitting between. All the galleries were filled to overflowing with the general public. On the platform were seated Rev. Dr. H. G. Weston of Crozier Theological Seminary, Rev. Dr. George C. Needham of Philadelphia, Rev. Dr. A. C. Dixon of Brooklyn, N. Y., Rev. Dr. H. M. Wharton of Baltimore, Rev. Franklin S. Hatch of Monson, Rev. Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman of New York City, S. H. Hadley of New York City, Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson, of Brooklyn, N. Y., Rev. R. A. Torrey of Chicago, Ill., Payson Hammond of Connecticut, John Wanamaker of Philadelphia and Rev. David Allen Reed of Springfield.

After the opening hymn, "A Little While," which was sung by the congregation, led by Prof. A. J. Phillips, and an invocation by Rev. Dr. Scofield, the Scripture lesson was read by Rev. Dr. A. T. Pierson, the portion selected being II. Cor. 4: 11 and subsequent verses. Rev. George C. Needham led in prayer, and the entire audience joined in singing "Emanuel's Land." Then followed addresses by Revs. Dr. Scofield, Weston and Torrey; Bishop W. F. Mallalieu, Rev. Dr. Chapman, Rev. Dr. Pierson and John Wanamaker, followed by a brief closing address by Will R. Moody.

Rev. Dr. Scofield's Eulogy

It is only possible in these pages to give the merest outline of the addresses, all of which were marked by deep feeling and earnest eloquence. Rev. Dr. Scofield, Mr. Moody's home pastor, at the conclu-

Mr. Moody's Life-work for the Master

IT is hard to write of Dwight L. Moody in the past tense, and his own words suggest the question whether it would ever be appropriate. "Some day," he once said, "you will be told that Moody is dead. Don't believe a word of it. At that very ›ment I shall be more truly alive than I n now. I shall then be beginning to e." He went on to explain his mean- in his own pointed, forcible style: "I is born of the flesh on February 5, 37. I was born of the Spirit in 1856. nat which was born of the flesh will die, course; but that which is born of the pirit will live forever." In that sense r. Moody is not dead, but is enjoying at fuller life which comes only when the dy is laid aside. But for us, who knew m and loved him and rejoiced in his liant services in the Master's cause, e tidings of his departure had a differ- t meaning. It is well with him; but re on earth there is a vacant place, a ince has fallen in Israel, and the scenes which he was so conspicuous and so eful will know him no more. The work initiated will go on; the memory of s soul-stirring words will live in many a art; but we are sadly conscious that e earnest, ringing voice is silent for us, nceforth; and the enthusiastic, cheering rsonality, that seemed to communicate s magnetic force to all with whom he me in contact, is lost to us. His life-work finished.

His Humble Birth

Reviewing that life, so full of activity nd successful service, we are impressed ith the unexpected way in which God lects and prepares his instruments. Who would have supposed that the man ho was to address the largest audiences er gathered for religious teaching, the an who was destined to win souls in umbers so enormous, was to come out f a little New England village, with no dvantages of education and no ecclesi- stical or academic training for his work. et so it was. Almost within sight of the ome at Northfield, in which he died, was he humble cottage in which he first saw he light. There was nothing there to ive augury of his future greatness. There as honest toil, strict economy and earn- st piety; but none of the adventitious ids which are supposed to be necessary o the attainment of world-wide fame. In is fourth year an event occurred which hreatened to doom him to a life of toil nd obscurity. His father died suddenly, eaving behind him nine children for his idow to support on a mortgaged farm. Mr. Moody often spoke in later years of he splendid courage his honored mother lisplayed in the emergency. She took p the burden laid upon her, and, refusing o allow her children to be scattered, de- termined on maintaining the home.

It must have been a hard struggle, but her children stood by her loyally. "Dwight used to think himself a man when he was only a boy," his mother used to say in after years. When only six years old he went to a farmer and engaged himself as a hired help, his duty being to drive the cows to and from their pasture morning and evening. The sturdy independence of the lad was astonishing in one of his age. He worked on the farm, getting such educational help as the village school afforded until he was seventeen, when he felt that the time had come for him to enter a wider sphere. His mother had a brother in Boston engaged in the shoe business, and to him young Moody went to get employment. The wise man accepted his nephew's offer, but made three conditions. The boy must live in a boarding house of his uncle's selection: he must not wander about the city in the evening, nor go to places of amusement of which his uncle did not approve; and he must regularly attend the Mount Vernon church and Sunday School. The boy agreed to all and honorably kept his bargain. The third condition appears to have been a little irksome at first, but before two years had passed Dwight L. Moody was an applicant for membership in the church, and was admitted.

In the Fall of 1856 Mr. Moody removed to Chicago, where he found employment as clerk in a shoe store. He united with the Plymouth Congregational Church and volunteered for Sunday School work. He does not appear to have met with much encouragement; but he did not belong to the class that is easily discouraged. He surprised the trustees by hiring four pews, which was an unusual thing for a bachelor to do. But it was his habit to look up any young men whom he could get acquainted with, and he would invite them to occupy his pews. They were filled at every service. He also found a little mission church in North Wells street which seemed to be in need of help and he offered his services as a teacher in the Sunday School. He was told that there were already teachers for all the classes, but if he would bring new pupils he could form another class. The next Sunday he marched in at the head of eighteen barefooted children, whom he had collected out of the slums. Each one, he reminded the superintendent, had a soul to be saved, unpromising as the material looked. The class grew so rapidly and received additions of so many older members, that Mr. Moody rented an empty saloon for its accommodation. In a short time he had a Sunday School of his own, with seven hundred children and sixty teachers. Larger quarters becoming necessary, Mr. Moody obtained the use of a large room over the old North Market, which was used on Saturday nights for dancing. After the dances were over, Mr. Moody took possession of the room and with his own hands swept and cleaned it and prepared it for the meeting of the Sunday School.

Activity for the Master

He also opened it for a week evening service, to which in some way known only to himself, he brought a motley audience. Like his Master he sought out the neglected and the lost, and found his hearers among the heathen of the city. So fascinated did he become in this work, that he took the bold step of giving up his business to devote all his time to it. "But how are you going to live?" asked a practical friend, to whom he announced the step he had taken. "I don't know," Mr. Moody replied, "but I can stand it for several weeks and if at the end of that time God wishes me to keep on, he will provide the means. He can, you know." Mr. Moody's faith was justified by results. In a short time the work outgrew its quarters and Mr. John V. Farwell came to its relief by erecting Farwell Hall, which had accommodations for the Y. M. C. A. as well as for Mr. Moody's mission. The outbreak of the Civil War turned Mr. Moody's attention temporarily in another direction. He visited the camps and made addresses to the soldiers. There he first realized his power as a speaker and acquired that manly, argumentative style of talk which characterized all his subsequent addresses. After the war he resumed his evangelizing of the slums of Chicago. Farwell Hall was burned, but Mr. Moody refused to regard the destruction as an intimation that his work there was ended. While the ruins were still smoking, he was around among the business men of the city with a subscription paper, and as soon as it was possible to occupy the ground he had the funds in hand for the erection of a new building, and the plans for it in the builders' hands.

His Field Two Continents

The mission grew with such rapidity that in 1863 it was necessary to erect a church building. Mr. Moody married, and a career of increasing usefulness and prosperity as a city pastor appeared to be opening before him. The great fire, however, changed that prospect. Mr. Moody was called to serve all our cities, and to minister to the church universal. The great meetings in the Hippodrome, New York, must have convinced him, if he had needed conviction, of the character of his future work. It is unnecessary to tell here the story of his campaigns, in which, accompanied by Mr. Ira D. Sankey, he went to every city, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Canada to the Gulf. On the other side the Atlantic the triumphs were as great. No buildings were large enough to hold the people who thronged to hear a plain man, in strong, forcible Anglo-Saxon words, explain the way of salvation. Wherever he spoke, either in his own land or across the Atlantic, the common people heard him gladly: and men like Drummond and Gladstone, highly educated as they were, sat at his feet delighted.

Exhausting as such labors were, Mr. Moody's energies were not satisfied. The enterprises at Northfield, already fully described in these columns, are a testimony to his boundless activity. The Seminary for Girls, established in 1879, was the beginning of an educational work which has developed with phenomenal rapidity. The Chicago Institute, the School for Boys at Mount Hermon, and the names, the buildings at Northfield—which make up a town of themselves—are all memorials of the devotion and consecration with which he applied himself to the Master's service. Nor did these alone exhaust his energy. Of late years his summer schools—in which many a minister has gained new inspiration for his work—have won for him the gratitude of the churches. Besides these, his pen was always busy, and his Colportage Library has penetrated with its Gospel literature to every corner of the English-speaking world. Yet to the last he was devising new methods of service, and was looking forward to labors still more abundant.

The Mormon Practise of Polygamy

By Gen. John Eaton

Ex-United States Commissioner of Education

IT is well-known how openly Mormons a few years ago taught and practised polygamy. Not a few of them made a boast of the number of their wives. Utah was then a Territory. Congress, by the United States Constitution, has absolute control even in all police matters over the conditions of our Territories. For years George Q. Cannon, a polygamist in theory and practise, was elected delegate to Congress, and allowed to have his seat in the House of Representatives until the moral sentiment of the country rose up and forbid his admission. Mr. Edmunds secured the passage of the anti-polygamy laws protecting the family. My study of the situation at the time had convinced me that under our system a constitutional amendment was necessary to protect the family—that institution so fundamental to all others in the United States. While Congress could legislate specifically and comprehensively for the Territories, the national Constitution made no provision with reference to marriage, but left that subject entirely to the respective States.

The country generally became convinced that polygamy was blotted out and that the great American sentiment in favor of the purity of the home was completely triumphant even among Mormons. But the Mormon leaders had stooped to conquer. On their formally solemn pledge, Utah was admitted to Statehood; but the doctrine of plural marriages, it was all along observed, had never been stricken from their book of doctrines. No sooner was the State constitution prohibiting polygamy adopted and Statehood secured, which under our system carried the right of regulating marriage and divorce, than some of the Mormons began to say, "now we can practise our religion," meaning by it polygamy. Even those who had been convicted of the crime in the courts and formerly pardoned on condition of their observance of the law, here and there began to show signs of disregard for their pledges. There are those among them who have a great way of saying one thing and doing another. Their leaders not only pledged absolute non-practise of plural marriage, but up to this time they have declared that plural marriages have not occurred. They found the feeling in the American mind that criminal husbands should support and save from suffering the plural wives with whom they were compelled to cease to live. The general belief that their prophet Smith taught plural marriage, and that it was not condemned in the sight of God, and that in communities pervaded by this sentiment there could be no one to prosecute those who continued to live with their wives, they continued to do this in spite of the promises and declarations of the Mormon leaders. The Christian ministers in their midst reported their belief that the law was still violated and the Mormons as stoutly denied. As evidence that their denial was true, they pointed to the fact that there were no prosecutions. Now, it turns out, that there are localities even in Utah ready to enforce the law.

The result in the case of the Apostle Cannon became notorious. Evidence was so clear against him as the violator of the law that he was compelled to come forward and confess his guilt and pay the fine. Just now five others have been brought up before the court at Richfield, Utah, and confessed their guilt and received the judgments of the court, in each and every case promising in the future careful obedience to the law, thus proving the statement of the Christian ministers and giving the lie to the declaration of the Mormon leaders. An eminent clergyman, familiar with the increasing Mormon Colony in Canada, writes that they do not adjure their belief. They openly teach polygamy but claim they are obedient to the law of the country and do not practise it, while it is generally believed by candid observers that this claim is a deception. Polygamy is taught in their books of doctrine, and the evidence is increasing that polygamy is still practised among them.

∴ Fireside Talks About Jesus ∴

JOHN,
Herald and Prophet

By. Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts.
Int'l S. S. Lesson for
Jan. 21. Luke

"A CHRISTIAN herald and hero, because he was first of all a 'seer' of God and a 'friend of the Bridegroom;' such was John the Baptizer, the Nazarite, who prepared the way for Christ by moral reforms; in profound recognition of which fact his story is studied as a 'temperance lesson' in schools and homes all round the world to-day." Thus Uncle Will opened his "round-table," at which the Cross-Roads farmers and their families, as Knights of the Cross, every Sabbath at twilight studied of and with their invisible King.

"Reformers of to-day," remarked Selah Brown, our cheery optimist, "will find not only courage but encouragement in this story, if only in the roll of rascals in church and state with which it starts out; first, Tiberius, then a brace of Herods, then Pilate, then Annas and Caiphas. The Cæsar or Czar of to-day, with all his injustice to Poland, is not to be compared with Tiberius Cæsar, 'the meanest of all mankind,' who would not have held the crown of our modern world for a day. Was it not he who deified his horse as well as himself? In any case he was the worse brute of the two. Christendom, meaning Christ's kingdom, is bad enough, but compared with even classic pagandom it is regnant humanity compared with regnant brutality. And the two Herods of this story, whose family name has become the verb of cruelty in the proverb, 'It outherods Herod,' would not be tolerated as rulers in the most backward of our civilized nations."

"I think we have plenty of Pilates, however," said Mr. Isaacs; "politicians who try to walk the fence of impossible neutrality, only to fall flat on the wrong side in the pages of history. And Annas and Caiphas also live to-day in ecclesiastics who care more for their church machinery than for man."

Influence of the Cross "On the whole," Uncle Will observed, "individual and social life will be found to have greatly improved wherever the Cross has gone if we measure each age, as we should, by its best, the best of Rome in the first century against the best of Toronto in the nineteenth."

"I have here," said Mr. Isaacs, "Dr. Lyman Abbott's picture of the Roman Empire at the time when John preached his crusade of repentance:

"Drinking bouts lasted, not for hours, but for days and even weeks; licentiousness assumed forms that cannot be mentioned in the modern page. Men dismissed their wives as freely as we dismiss our servants. That freedom, however, was not enough; marriage grew exceptional, and wealthy bachelors were so numerous that their fawning sycophants became a distinct and odious caste. The combative and destructive propensities were then as sedulously cultivated as they are now sedulously restrained. The chronic condition of every province was one of war. Rome was always mail-clad. The cruelty of her wars was unchecked by humane sentiments, public opinion, or an international code. . . . The very amusements of this degenerate age were battlings and murders; and imperial edicts, often disregarded and overstepped, were required to limit the number who might engage in the gladiatorial combats, for popular taste would have turned every such entertainment into a genuine battle field. Half the population of Rome were slaves; the proportion was scarcely less in Greece.

"To such a world John the Baptist cried imperatively, 'Repent.'"

The Turning-Point "Repentance and conversion," said Mr. Sanders, "both mean turning By repentance man's will turns from sin that in conversion his heart may be turned to God. John called not the will and heart only, but the feet also, into the way of truth. His sermon was mostly application."

JOHN THE BAPTIST

"This herald," was Uncle Will's quiet remark, "carried not a wand but an axe. At Cairo, in Egypt, I saw a herald, a lithe young man in a white garment reaching to the knees, girded at the waist, with a beautiful embroidered jacket, on his head a red fez with a pound of silk in its beautiful tassel, a wand in his right hand, running a rod or two in advance of a carriage through the narrow, crowded streets, and crying, 'Clear the way for my lord.'

Surely we need such a moral herald as John was in our city streets to-day to cry to newsdealers, bill-posters, theatre managers, slot-machine gamblers and polluters, saloon-keepers, and, most of all, to public officers, 'Clear the way for Christ and a true civilization!' These are the things that delay the chariot of Christ. Law is a John the Baptist in that its mission is to remove such needless temptations of youth and so make it 'harder to do wrong and easier to do right.'"

GEN. GRANT'S VISIT TO CONSUL WASSEF KHAYAT

"But," here said Mrs. Uncle Will, "the herald referred to in this story was the greater herald who makes the very road for his king, going miles and months in advance, with assistants, to dig down hills and fill up valleys and build a royal road. It is said that in the march of Semiramis to Ecbatane, she came to the Zarcean mountain, which, extending many furlongs, and being full of craggy precipices and deep hollows, could not be passed without taking a long sweep round. Being desirous of having a lasting memorial of herself, as well as of shortening the way, she ordered the precipices to be digged down, and the hollows to be filled up, and made a shorter and more expeditious road, subsequently called the Road of Semiramis."

"Thus queenly womanhood," said Thomas Brown, with a touch of gallantry, "is to-day preparing the way for Christ, especially as mother and teacher, hardly less as wife and sister. Woman's pen also is a spade of might for this building of the King's highway."

A Story of Gen. Grant "A close modern parallel to the herald of the story," said Mr Isaacs, "is given by Layyah Barakat: 'When Gen. Grant was making his tour around the world, he was invited by a United States consul, Wassef Khayat, to visit him at Assioot, Egypt. The invitation was accepted, and for several weeks before Gen. Grant was to arrive, the consul kept more than two hundred men at work at his own expense, preparing the road over which General Grant was to travel, making the high places low and the crooked places straight. When the day arrived on which General Grant was expected, the roadway for a long distance from the consul's house was spread with Turkish rugs. Six heralds, dressed all in white, and with golden wands in their hands, were dispatched to run before the carriage and clear the way. They cried out, 'Make way for the great American Grant.' When General Grant alighted at the consul's house, he was detained from entering until a beef, beautifully garlanded with flowers, had been brought out. It was killed and cut into two pieces, which were laid on either side of the doorway. Then the consul invited General Grant to enter his home with him. They stepped over the blood on the threshold, and between the pieces. By this act they entered into the most solemn covenant known to the Oriental—the blood covenant—and thus became 'blood brothers,' a relation which outranks every other relation in life. One blood brother can not ask anything that the other will refuse. David and Jonathan were blood brothers. God conferred this honor upon Abraham when he bade him slay several animals and lay the pieces one over against another, and God himself passed through as 'a smoking furnace and a burning lamp' (see Gen. 15:5-18). Afterwards Abraham withheld not Isaac when it was this God who asked that he should be laid upon the altar. The Christian enters into a blood covenant with God the Father, through the blood of Jesus Christ his Son, as the victim. Having made this covenant, all that a Christian has of time, talent, money and influence, must be subject to his call. That is what consecration means."

Watching for His Coming "John heralds to our homes and hearts, not a human general, but a divine King, for a blood brotherhood that is eternal," said Ruth, the modest Quakeress. "Isaiah from the watch-tower of prophetic vision, saw afar off the coming of the long-expected Christ, the 'King of glory', whose dominion would extend from sea to sea. Before him, in the vision, ran a herald, whom the prophet seems to have heard without seeing, for he calls him 'the voice' of one crying in the wilderness, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord. Make straight in the desert a highway for our God.' And then he seems to hear the blows of axes in the forest, and strokes of picks on the mountains, as he makes a road for the coming King, and declares that for him every hill shall be brought low, and every valley filled up, and the crooked places be made straight, and the rough places a pass. The coming herald and messenger was to be spiritually an Elijah, one of kindred spirit and energy to that Tishbite who seemed almost like a spiritual presence as he suddenly confronted kings and denounced them for their sins, and then as suddenly took himself away where his enemies were unable to find him, only to appear again, as unexpectedly as before, whenever he had a message from God to deliver. These prophesies were fulfilled after years of waiting, in the birth of a child who was a foreordained abstainer and reformer, and was called John, 'the gift of God.' Every reform and every reformer is such a gift."

Concerning Conversions "The church in this age of cities," said Uncle Will, "needs to learn that a good environment helps conversion before and after. The profoundest word I have heard on the general lament over diminished conversions is the word of Dr. Wylie, of Wilkinsburg, that probably we shall not see an increase or even prevent a decrease until we give more attention to environment."

"Yet more in heathen lands," here observed Andrew Brown, a soldier boy just home from the Philippines, "is the drink traffic a stumbling-block in the way of redemption. Mr. Peyton, Army Secretary of the St. Andrew Society, reported to Bishop Potter that it was useless to introduce American missionaries in Manila with four hundred and thirty American saloons discrediting American Christianity. Missionary work for our new islands should begin with those by whose permission saloons have followed our flag."

"If John were living to-day," said Uncle Will, "there would be no lack of righteous rebukes. He was the hero of free speech, whether speaking to the wicked king and the divorcee at his side or to to the excitable Jewish crowd, whom he called 'a generation of vipers.' He was not silent on 'the wrath to come.' He hewed down all family trees that had ceased to bear fruit and threw them into the fire. To those who thought to be saved by mere heredity and ritual he taught the gospel of giving. Speaking straight to the mark, he told the political cheats, known as publicans, to quit their tax extortion."

"And he shot straight at us soldiers," said Andrew Brown, "when he condemned disorder and discontent. Our soldiers have certainly not personified law and order, and one of the chief reasons is the canteen."

Luther and the Soldier "As Luther drew near the door which was to admit him into the presence of his judges in the Diet of Worms," said Ruth "he met the celebrated George of Ffeundsberg, who, four years later, at the head of his German lansquenets, bent the knee with his soldiers on the field of Pavia, and then, charging to the left of the French army, drove it into the Ticino, and in a great measure decided the captivity of the King of France. The old general, seeing Luther pass, tapped him on the shoulder, and shaking his head, blanched in many battles, said kindly, 'Poor monk, poor monk! thou art now going to make a nobler stand than I or any other captains have ever made in the bloodiest of our battles. But if thy cause be just, and thou art sure of it, go forward in God's name, and fear nothing. God will not forsake thee.' A noble and truthful tribute of respect paid by the courage of the sword to the courage of the mind. You can find a thousand men to follow the knight to battle, where you can find one to follow Luther in confessing their convictions where they will be ridiculed or opposed."

"The best thing about this story, as a temperance lesson," said Mrs. Brown, "is that John was a great spiritual and Christian reformer. That is what we stand for," she continued pointing to her white ribbon. "We are but herald servants to clear the way for Christ and the Holy Spirit by removing evils that keep men from God. One in a hundred of the women of the churches and a lesser proportion of its men have gone out in reform organizations as scouting parties for the army, the church of God. Some day, on that main army shall fall, as a spiritual baptism, a passion for the redemption of society, and it shall be purged with that fire of holy enthusiasm of the evils that can remain only until the church awakes to its power and opportunity."

Insomnia

Or, Comfort for Poor Sleepers

Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Psalms 77: 4, ... Thou holdest mine eyes waking SLEEP is the vacation of the soul; it is the mind gone into the playground of dreams; it is the relaxation of muscles and the solace of the nerves: it is the hush of activities; it is the soft curtaining of the eyes: it is a trance of eight hours: it is calming of the pulses; it is a breathing such slower though far deeper: it is a temporary oblivion of all carking cares; this is the doctor recognized by all schools of medicine: it is a divine narcotic; it is a complete anæsthetic; it is an angel of the night: it is a great mercy of God for the human race. Lack of it puts patients on the rack of torture, or in the madhouse, or in the grave. O, blessed sleep! No wonder the Bible makes much of it, that through sleep so sound, that a surgical incision of the side of Adam did not waken him, came the best temporal blessing ever afforded to man—wifely companionship. While in sleep on a pillow of rock Jacob saw a ladder set up, with angels coming down and climbing, so "He giveth his beloved sleep," soliloquized the Psalmist. Solomon listens at the door of a tired workman, and eulogizes his pillow by saying: "The sleep of a laboring man is sweet." Peter was calmly sleeping between the two constables the night before his expected assassination. Christ was asleep in a boat on Galilee when tossed in the Euroclydon. The annunciation was made to Joseph in sleep, and death is described as only a sleep, and the resurrection as a glorious wakening out of sleep.

On the other hand, insomnia or sleeplessness is an old disorder spoken of again and again in the Bible. Ahasuerus suffered from it, and we read: "In that night could not the king sleep." Joseph Hall said of that ruler: "He that could command a hundred and seven and twenty provinces could not command sleep." Nebuchadnezzar had insomnia, and the record is: "His sleep brake from him." Solomon describes this trouble, and says: "Neither day nor night seeth he sleep with his eyes." Asaph was its victim, for he complains in my text that his eyes are wide open at midnight, some mysterious power keeping the upper and lower lids from joining: "Thou holdest mine eyes waking."

Insomnia, which has troubled all nations and all ages, has its widest swing in our land, because of the push and speed of all styles of activities as in no other land. Where there is one man or woman with equipoise of nerves, there are a dozen with overwrought and tangled ganglion. At some time in life almost everyone has had a touch of it. It has been called "Americanitis." Last night there were, as there will be to-night, millions of people to whom the words of the text are appropriate utterance: "Thou holdest mine eyes waking."

Wonderful is that law which Ralph Waldo Emerson called the "law of compensation," and it has been so arranged that while the hard-working populations of the earth are denied many of the luxuries, they have at least one luxury which many of the affluent of the earth are denied, and for which some of them would give millions of dollars in cash down, namely, capacity to sleep. The most of those who toil with hand and foot do not have to send out invitations to sleep. They require no bromide or valerian or sulphonal or triavol to put them to nightly unconsciousness. In five minutes after their head touches their pillow they are as far off from the wall they were building, or the ditch they were digging, or the anvil they were pounding, or the wheels they were controlling, as heaven is from earth. About three o'clock in the morning, the body at lowest temperature and its furnaces nearly out, what a complete quietude for the entire physical and mental structure! All night long, for such, sleep is busy with its enchanted anointing of every corpuscle of the arteries and every molecule of the entire physical organism, and the morning finds the subjects of such sleep rebuilt, reconstructed, and touched of God into a new life.

Of course, there is an unrighteous sleep, as when Jonah, trying to escape from duty, slept in the sides of the ship while the Mediterranean was in wrath because of that prophetic passenger: as when Columbus in his first voyage, exhausted from being up many nights, gave the ship in charge of the steersman and the crew, who, leaving the management of the vessel to boys, went asleep and allowed the ship to strike on the sandbanks of Saint Thomas: as when the sentinel goes to sleep at his post, endangering the whole army; as when the sluggard, who accomplishes nothing the day before he went to sleep, and will accomplish nothing the day after he wakes, fills up Solomon's picture of him, as he yawns out: "A little sleep, and a little slumber, and a little folding of the hands to sleep." But sleep at the right time and amid the right circumstances, can you imagine anything more blessed? If sleep, according to sacred and profane literature, is an emblem of death, the morning to all refreshed slumberers is a resurrection.

Remark the first: If you have escaped the insomnia spoken of in the text, thank God. Here and there one can command sleep, and it comes the minute he orders it and departs at the minute he wishes it to go: As Napoleon, when he wrote: "Different affairs are arranged in my head as in drawers. When I wish to interrupt one train of thought, I close the drawer which contains that subject and open that which contains another. They do not mix together or inconvenience me. I have never been kept awake by an involuntary preoccupation of mind. When I wish for repose I shut up all the drawers and I am asleep. I have always slept when I wanted rest, and almost at will." But I think in most cases we feel that sleep is not the result of a resolution, but a direct gift from God. You cannot purchase it. A great French financier cried out: "Alas! why is there no sleep to be sold?"

Do not take this divine gift as a matter of course. Your seven or eight hours of healthful unconsciousness is a blessing worthy of continuous and emphatic recognition. Praise the Lord for three hundred and sixty-five resurrections in a year! Artificial slumber can be made up by the apothecaries: but natural sleep is a balm, a panacea, a catholicon that no one but God can mix. With it he bathes your eyes and brain and nerve and bone. It is a soft robe woven in heaven, with which he wraps your body, mind and soul. The more scientists explore this mystery of sleep the more profound it seems. God tells us many things, but that is a secret he keeps to himself. We philosophize and guess about this phenomenon, but will never know just what sleep is until we are told about it when we get through the last sleep. Thank God morning, noon and night for this strange quietude, this refreshing dismissal, this recuperating absence, this reinforcement of energies, this mighty benediction.

Remark the second: Consider among the worst crimes, the robbery of ourselves or others of this mercy of slumber. Much ruinous doctrine has been inculcated on this subject. Thomas Moore gave poor advice when he said: "The best way to lengthen our days is to steal a few hours from the night." We are told that though they did their work at night, Copernicus lived to be seventy-three years of age and Galileo seventy-eight years, and Herschel eighty-four years. Yes; but the reason was they were all star-hunters, and the only time for hunting stars is at night. Probably they slept by day. The night was made for slumber. The worst lamp a student can have is "the midnight lamp." Lord Brougham never passed more than four hours of the night abed, and Justinian, after one hour of sleep, would rise from his couch. But you are neither a Justinian nor a Lord Brougham. Let not the absurd apotheosis of early rising induce you to the abbreviation of sleep. Get up when you are slept out, unless circumstances compel otherwise. Have no alarm-clock making its nerve-tearing racket at four o'clock in the morning, unless special reasons demand the forsaking of your pillow at that hour. Most of the theories about early rising we inherited from times when people retired at eight or nine o'clock in the evening. Such early retirement is impossible in our own times for those who are taking part in the great activities of life. There is no virtue in the mere act of early rising. It all depends upon what you do after you get up. It would be better for the world if some people never wakened at all.

But most Americans do not get sleep enough. The sin of late retiring is one most widespread and ruinous. What is much needed is that in all our cities those who are leaders in social life turn back the hour of drawing-room assemblage from ten and eleven o'clock to eight or half-past seven, so that the guests at ten or half-past ten may meet sleep at the right hour in their own dormitories. Two or three social heroines could do that in all the towns and cities. Thousands of men and women are slain each year by late hours. Five years is more than the average of endurance The vitality of men and women is depleted, and they go into chronic ailments, if they do not die of dyspepsia or consumption or nervous prostration, and the beauty goes out of the cheek beyond all restoration of cosmetics. Late retiring is the mother of premature wrinkles. Lack of sleep assassinates social life. A reformation is needed, and if the customs of the world could be changed in this matter, and the curtains of social life could be rung down at a reasonable hour of the night, twenty per cent. would be added to the world's longevity.

Remark the third: All those ought to be comforted who by overwork in right directions have come to insomnia. In all occupations and professions there are times when a special draft is made upon the nervous energy. There are thousands of men and women who cannot sleep because they were injured by overwork in some time of domestic or political or religious exigency. Mothers who, after taking a whole family of children through the disorders that are sure to strike the nursery, have been left physical wrecks, and one entire night of slumber is to them a rarity, if not an impossibility. The attorney-at-law who, through a long trial in poorly ventilated court-room, has stood for weeks battling for the rights of widows and orphans, or for the life of a client in whose innocence he is confident, though all the circumstances are unfavorable. In his room he tries the case all night long, and every night, when he would like to be slumbering. The physician, in time of epidemic, worn out in saving the lives of whole families, and failing in his attempts to sleep at night between the janglings of his door-bell. The merchant who has experienced panics, when the banks went down, and Wall Street became a pandemonium, and there was a possibility that the next day he would be penniless—that night with no more possibility of gaining sleep than if such a blessing had never touched our planet. Ministers of the Gospel, in time of great revival, all their powers of endurance drawn upon day by day, and week by week, and month by month—sermonic preparation, neighborhood visitation, heart-breaking obsequies, sympathetic help for the anxious, the despairing, and the dying. It is a wonder that ministers of the Gospel have any nerves left, and that the angel of sleep does not quit their presence forever.

But I hear and now pronounce highest consolation for all those who in any department have sacrificed their health to duty. Your sleeplessness is as much a wound as you can find on any battle-field, and is an honorable wound. We all look with reverence and admiration upon one who has lost an eye or an arm in the service of his country, and we ought to look with admiration upon those who through extreme fidelity to their life-work have lost capacity for slumber. Remember glorious Albert Barnes going along the streets of Philadelphia four o'clock in the morning for many years to his church study, writing all his commentaries before breakfast, and keeping on until he was stone blind. Will not the Lord reward such sacrifices? and if, through your fidelity, you have lost capacity to sleep, God, who never slumbers nor sleeps, will look after you. When you hear the clock strike twelve, and one, and two, and three, and four, without your going into slumber, let it remind you that you have not been a sluggard or a do-nothing. You are suffering in a good cause. Paul got sore eyes in the Lord's service, and had many a scar, but so far from complaining about it, he exults in those scars, saying—in the only inspired letter we know that he wrote with his own hand, for the other letters were dictated to amanuenses—in that letter to the Galatians: "I bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus."

It is high time that we enlarge the scroll of martyrs. We are accustomed to put in that scroll only those who have gone down under headsman's axe, or have been wrapped in fires at the stake, or torn apart with the machinery of persecution. But the world is full of martyrs who were never touched by any such instruments of torture. Many of our public men in this capital, and indeed in all the capitals, have their life beaten out of them by interruptions, annoyances, and unreasonable demands added to their straightforward duties. Washington sends many of the public men back to their different States worn out and incapacitated. Why is it that in all our land there are but two ex-presidents and two ex-vice-presidents? The others were slain by the exhaustions of public life or by hand of assassin. Our public men cannot control their time, cannot regulate their hours, cannot escape the imploration of constituents. All who go down to invalidism through the service of God or their country are martyrs.

Remark the fourth: Insomnia is no sign of divine displeasure. Martin Luther had distressing insomnia, and wrote: "When I wake up in the night, the devil immediately comes and disputes with me and gives me strange thoughts, until at last I grow enraged beyond endurance and give him ill words." That consecrated champion of everything good, Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Senior, in his autobiography, says that the only encouragement he had to think he would sleep at night, was the fact that he had not slept the night before. One of the greatest English clergymen had a gas jet on either side of his bed, so that he might read nights when he could not sleep. Horace Greeley told me he had not had a sound sleep in fifteen years. Charles Dickens understood London by night better than any other writer, because not being able to sleep, he spent that time in exploring the city.

Perhaps this wakefulness may come to you as an opportunity to think over the mercies of the past and lay out plans for the future. David occupied the hours of wakefulness in music. He speaks of "songs in the night." We could hardly recommend such a solo for most people, for it would disturb the slumber of others; and you have no right, because you cannot sleep yourself, to keep others awake. But the cheerful endurance suggested by that midnight music of the Psalmist we can commend.

Wakefulness may be an opportunity for prayer, opportunity for profitable reflection, opportunity for kindling bright expectations of the world, where there is no night and where slumber will have no uses. God thinks just as much of you when you get but three or four hours of sleep as when at night you get eight or nine hours. One of the greatest prayer-meetings ever held was in a penitentiary at twelve o'clock at night, where Paul and Silas could not sleep. The record says they prayed and sang praises to God. They had cured an idiotic girl of her trouble, and for that they were imprisoned. They were robbed of their liberty, but not of their psalmody. Have you ever thought that sleeplessness may be turned into a rapture, a communion with God, a preparation for heaven?

Remark the fifth: Let all insomnists know for their consolation, that some people sleep more rapidly than others, as much in one hour as others do in two, and hence do not require as long a time in unconsciousness. In a book on the subject of health years ago, I saw this fact stated by a celebrated medical scientist. Some people do everything quick—they eat quick; they walk quick; they think quick; and, of course, they sleep quick. An express train can go as far in thirty minutes as a way train in sixty minutes People of rapid temperaments ought not to expect a whole night to do the work of recuperation, which slow temperaments require. Instead of making it a matter of irritation and alarm, be a Christian philosopher, and set down this abbreviation of somnolence as a matter of temperament. An antelope ought not to complain because it was not an ox, nor an eagle because it can go faster than a barnyard fowl.

Remark the sixth: The aged insomnists should understand that if their eyes are held waking, they do not require as much sleep as once they did. Solomon, who in knowledge was thousands of years ahead of his time, in his wondrous description of old age, recognizes this fact. He not only speaks of the difficulty of mastication on the part of the aged when he says: "The grinders cease because they are few;" and of the octogenarian's caution in getting up a ladder or standing on a scaffolding, saying: "They shall be afraid of that which is high;" and speaks of the whiteness of the hair, by comparing it to a tree that has white blossoms, saying: "The almond tree shall flourish;" and speaks of the spinal cord, which is of the color of silver, and which relaxes in old age, giving the tremor to the head, saying: "The silver cord be loosed;" but he says of the aged: "He shall rise up at the voice of the bird;" that is about half-past four in the summer time, an appropriate hour for the bird to rise, for he goes to his nest or bough at half-past seven in the evening. But the human mechanism has been so arranged that after it has been running a good while a change takes place, and instead of the almost perpetual sleep of the babe, and the nine hours requisite in midlife, six hours will do for the aged, and "He shall rise up at the voice of the bird." Let all aged men and women remember that they have been permitted to do a great deal of sleeping in their time, and that if they do not sleep so well now as they used to, it is because they do not require so much sleep.

Remark the seventh: Insomnia is probably a warning that you had better moderate your work. Most of those engaged in employments that pull on nerve and brain are tempted to omit necessary rest, and sleeplessness calls a halt Even their pleasuring turns to work, as Sir Joshua Reynolds, the great painter, taking a walk with a friend, met a sunbrowned peasant boy and said, "I must go home and deepen the coloring of my infant Hercules." The sunbrowned boy suggested an improvement in a great picture. By the time most people have reached mid-life, if they have behaved well, more doors of opportunity open before them than they ought to enter. Power to decline, power to say "No," they should now cultivate. When a man is determined to be useful and Satan cannot dissuade him from that course, the great deceiver induces him to overwork and in that way get rid of him. We have thermometers to tell the heat, and barometers to tell the air, and ometers hung in engine rooms to tell the pressure of steam, and ometers to gage and measure almost everything. Would that some genius would invent an ometer which, being hung around the neck and dropped over heart and lung, would, by the pulsation and respiration, tell whether one is under too great pressure or might carry more. All brain workers would want such an ometer and want it right away. For the lack of it how many are dying, and how many have died of overwork? A prominent financier who recently departed this life, was an officer in over a hundred financial and charitable institutions. Thousands of editors, of lawyers, of physicians, of merchants, of clergymen, are now dying of overwork. Do not be in the board of directors of more than three banks, and two trust companies, and five life and fire insurance establishments. Do not as pastor, preach more than three sermons a Sunday, and superintend your own Sabbath school, and conduct a Bible class the same day. Do not edit a paper and write for three magazines and go to four public dinners where you will be called to make a speech, more than four times a week. Do not go so deep into the real estate business that before Spring all the real estate you will really possess will be a piece of ground about six feet long and three feet wide. Your insomnia is the voice of nature, the voice of God, saying, "Better slow up!" Stop that long, swift train, the wheels of which are taking fire from the velocity and smoking with the hot-box. Do not burn the candle at both ends. Do not under too many burdens sweat like a camel trudging from Aleppo to Damascus. Do not commit suicide.

Remark the eighth: All the victims of insomnia ought to be consoled with the fact that they will have a good long sleep after a while. Sacred and profane literature again and again speak of that last sleep. God knew that the human race would be disposed to make a great ado about exit from this world, and so he inspires Job, and David, and Daniel, and John, and Paul to call that condition "sleep." When at Bethany the brother, who was the support of his sisters after their father and mother were gone, had himself expired, Christ cried out in regard to him: "He is not dead but sleepeth." Cheering thought to all poor sleepers, for that will be a pleasant sleep, induced by no narcotic, disturbed by no frightful dream, interrupted by no harsh sound. Better than any sleep you ever took, O child of God, will be the last sleep. In your other slumbers your home may be invaded by burglars and your treasures carried off, but while here and there, in one case out of millions, the resurrectionist may disturb the pillow of dust, the last sleep is almost sure to be kept from invasion. There will be no burglary of the tomb. And it will be a refreshing sleep. You have sometimes risen in the morning more weary than when you laid down at night, but waking from the sleep of which I speak, the last fatigue, the last ache, the last worriment will be forever gone. O, what a refreshing sleep!

Most people are tired. The nights do not repair the day. Scientists, by minute calculation, say that every night comes a little short of restoring the body to where it was the day before, and so every seventh day was put in for entire rest, to make up in reparation for what the nights could not do. But so restful will be the last sleep that you will rise from it without one sore nerve, without one tired limb—rested, forever rested, as only God can rest you. O, ye tired folks all up and down the world! tired with work, or tired with persecutions, or tired with ailments, or tired with bereavements, or tired in the struggle against temptation, clap your hands with eternal glee in expectation of that sleep from which you will wake up so rested that you will never need another sleep or even another night. "There shall be no night there," because there will be no need of its quieting influences. No lengthening of the shadows of tower and wall and gate. No evening mist rising from the river. No sundown. "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended."

So, my hearer, my reader, "Good night!" May God give you such sleep tonight as is best for you, and if you wake too soon, may he fill your soul with reminiscences and expectations that will be better than slumber. Good night! Having in prayer, kneeling at the bedside, committed yourself and all yours to the keeping of the slumberless God, fear nothing. The pestilence that walketh in darkness will not cross your doorsill, and you need not be afraid of evil tidings Good night! May you have no such experience as Job had when he said: "Thou scarest me with dreams and terrifiest me through visions." If you dream at all, may it be a vision of reunions and congratulations, and, waking, may you find some of them true. Good night! And when you come to the best sleep, the blissful sleep, the last sleep, may you be able to turn and say to all the cares and fatigues and bereavements and pangs of a lifetime, "Good night!" and your kindred, standing around your illumined pillow, give you hopeful though sorrowful farewell as you move out from their loving embrace into the bosom of a welcoming God. Good night!

Joy at the Bowery Mission

A Christmas Dinner to the Destitute Men, and a Tree for the Child-Waifs

FOR several days past we had been scouring the stores of the neighborhood, furnished with instructions, and the withal to carry them out, by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for the purpose of securing articles of wearing apparel for the destitute men of the Bowery. We had also carefully canvassed our congregation each evening during the preceding week, with a view of finding out what each man needed most. Then, everything being ready, we summoned the men to an early prayer meeting on Christmas morning. None knew of the parcels that lay in concealment until the meeting was over, and yet, among our new converts, there were but few absentees. It was a pathetic crowd that stood—for there was standing room only—in the spacious kitchen this Christmas morning, prepared to celebrate in simple fashion the great event that has now assumed such an intense interest in their own personal lives and destinies. There was a new light upon their faces. Tears stood in the eyes of some of the men, and there could be no mistake about the fervor and sincerity of the prayers and praise of all. Naturally there was an opportunity given for a few short testimonies.

THE BOWERY MISSION'S CHRISTMAS TREE

Quickly they came. Space will not allow many quotations, but they ran something like this: "I thank God for this Christmas day. Last year I spent the day in prison." "I want to say how much happier I am to-day than last year, when I spent the whole day in ———'s saloon." "This is the first time for twenty-one years that I shall have spent a sober Christmas day." "Last Christmas night I walked the streets a homeless man; now, I thank God, I have a happy home and a good position." Then came a few more stirring hymns, and a season of prayer, and the distribution of gifts.

This simple service was barely over when, one by one, the workers of the Rescue League arrived, and began decorating Mrs. Bird's Christmas tree. It was an immense and beautiful tree. With a speed born of long practise, it was uplifted and fixed, with five shining silver stars crowning its noble proportions. Then busy hands set to work hanging the hundreds and thousands of toys, dolls, banners, and spangles. High up on fourteen-foot ladder was one of th workers, accustomed to window dressing decorating the upper branches. Dow below another, an electrician, affixing a ingenious arrangement for decoratin the tree with electric lights, and the re busy with the lower branches. Mean while an immense concourse of East Sid children were gathering at the door packing the entrance, blockading the side walk, stretching away even to the verg of the trolley tracks in the middle of th Bowery thoroughfare.

When all was ready, the doors wer opened, and the stalwart policemen be gan the difficult task of selecting th smallest and neediest looking childre from the crowd. Soon every availabl square inch in the building was occupied the doors closed, and instructions give to admit no more; an edict which shortl afterwards imperiled the admission o even the pro prietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD him self. Nearly one thousand children fille the seats, while on the platform were many sympathizing friends One gracious and queenly lady, accompanied by her son and daughter, all of whom had forgone the pleasure of giving and receiving Christmas presents themselves, and had, instead, contributed to the Christmas Tree Fund, sat at Mrs. Bird's side. Dr. Klopsch was instantly recognized when he made his appearance, and cheered to the echo, and when in making a short and an exceedingly interesting address to the children he asked those who had visited THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home at Nyack during the previous summer to raise their hands, to his great delight hundreds responded by waving the right hand enthusiastically. The singing of the national airs by the children, to the accompaniment of the great organ, was a thrilling feature of the day. Then in orderly fashion the children marched up to the tree, one by one, and received an appropriate gift from Mrs. Bird; and as they passed out into the street, each one found a package of candy or an orange awaiting them.

There was barely time to clear away and ventilate the room before the evening meeting was due to commence. Again the hall was densely packed with typical Bowery men. Never was the interest more intense, never were the hymns more joyously triumphant, never were the testimonies more effective! At the close, many of the men present made the great decision.

The supper given to the men was furnished by the generosity of Mr. William Patterson, of Manchester, England.

So for twenty consecutive hours of this blessed Christmas day, the Bowery Mission was a scene of joyous and enthusiastic activity.

The American Tribute

LADIES of American birth, now living in Great Britain and on the Continent, have been doing a graceful and womanly thing in connection with the war in South Africa. They have united to equip a hospital ship, which has sailed for the scene of conflict. any friends in this country of the dies who had the matter in charge, have so sent contributions, notably Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who sent the most appropriate gift of an ambulance. The entire cost of furnishing the ship has been borne by Americans, so that it is America's expression of sympathy with the suffering. As it has cost more than $150,000 equip the vessel with the most improved surgical appliances, the work of the American ladies has been no sinecure. On this page is a photograph of the executive committee. The lady standing in the centre of the background, is the president of the committee and the originator of the movement, Lady Randolph Churchill, formerly Miss Jerome, of New York. Three eminent American surgeons and a corps of nurses, all Americans, sailed on the ship, after being received and personally thanked by the Queen. It expected that the vessel, which is named the Maine, will reach the Cape early this month. The movement has been very gratefully welcomed and very cordially appreciated by the English people, who recognize in it not only the sympathy of Americans, but the appropriateness of its expression in an endeavor to alleviate the inevitable miseries that war produces. This is the feminine side of the gloomy subject, and in dealing with it the American ladies have manifested the sweet compassion which is woman's charm. Even the Apostle Paul, who had not many kindly things to say of women, could appreciate this, and instructed his disciple to receive into the church women who had so distinguished themselves.

If she have relieved the afflicted; if she have diligently followed every good work (I. Tim. 5:10).

A Present in the Fire

During the holidays there was one home where joy turned to sorrow and sorrow back to joy in the course of one day. A lady in Newark, N. J., received from her husband as a Christmas gift a pair of handsome earrings. A fine large diamond glistened in the centre of each. The gift was greatly admired and appreciated. But there are many things that have to be done in a household on Christmas morning; and the lady, having admired her present, wrapped the jewels in the silver paper in which they came and laid them on the table, while she attended to her matronly duties. Later, during her husband's absence, the table was cleared up and several pieces of paper, including the one containing the earrings, were thrown into the fire. The owner speedily discovered her loss and, when her husband returned, he found her hysterically lamenting it. Knowing a little more than he did of the nature of diamonds, he had the fire raked out and the gems were found unharmed. The setting had melted out of shape, but that was a small matter compared with the recovery of the diamonds. They will be re-set and the lady will have her present after all. It may be hoped that she may have a similar experience in the day of final accounting and that she may then wear those better ornaments of which the Apostle spoke, on which the fire will have no power.

It shall be revealed by fire and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is (I. Cor. 3:13).

Killed by Friendly Greeting

A man lost his life by a remarkable accident a few days ago in New York. He was slightly deaf, and was standing at the bar of a saloon, with his back towards the door, when some friends entered. One of them recognized him and called out a merry greeting. The other apparently did not hear him, for he made no reply. His friend went close to him, and, laying a hand on each shoulder, gave him a sharp twist, first to the left, then to the right, at the same time uttering a friendly reproof to him for not responding to a cordial greeting. Those who stood near the two men heard a crack as the man's head turned under his friend's rough handling. When released, instead of turning around and shaking hands with his friend, as every one expected, he sank to the floor with a groan. A doctor was summoned, who, finding him unconscious, sent him to a hospital. It was there found that a vertebra at the base of the neck had been twisted out of place. He recovered consciousness for a short time, but died the same evening. Probably no one deplores the silly act which had the fatal result, more than the man who committed it. As he had no malice toward his victim, he will, doubtless, escape punishment, but he cannot escape remorse. It is so with those whom God pardons. As they witness the results of their sin, which they are powerless to undo, they learn what a grievous and bitter thing sin is. Like Peter, their sorrow is lifelong.

And when he thought thereon he wept (Mark 14:72).

Pardon for a Convict Hero

Probably few people enjoyed their Christmas holidays more than a man in Austin, Tex. He was a convict and expected to spend the holidays in the penitentiary with a prospect of spending many another holiday within the gloomy walls before he recovered his freedom. On December 23d, however, Governor Sayres sent him a full pardon in time for him to spend Christmas day with his friends. The pardon was a reward for a heroic act which the convict performed one day last summer. At that time he was confined in the convict camp in the Brazos River Valley. He was there when the great flood came and the river completely surrounded the camp. Several of the convicts took the opportunity to make their escape, but this one devoted himself to the saving of life and property. Hearing that one of the guards was lying sick in a house menaced by the flood and was unable to save his wife and child, the convict swam out to the house. He found a light wagon in the rear, in which he put the sick man and his wife and child. Tying a rope to it, he harnessed himself like a horse and dragged it into the raging flood. He swam across the river, then nearly two miles wide, and had the satisfaction of saving all three lives. It was this heroic deed which won him a pardon from the governor. He well deserved it, though not even such heroism could give him the right to claim it. Every one recognizes this fact, though it is often forgotten in considering the sinner's relations to God. Pardon must come by mercy and cannot be earned.

By grace are ye saved through faith; and that not of yourselves: it is the gift of God, not of works, lest any man should boast (Eph. 2:8).

The Boer War

The commanders of the British forces in South Africa appear to have faithfully observed the instructions reported to have been sent from London, to "mark time" and refrain from aggressive movements. A week of inactivity followed the most recent repulse, but the inactivity appears to have implied only that there was no actual fighting. The Boers have been busy strengthening their intrenchments on the Tugela, and it is now declared by skilled authorities that their position is impregnable. If it is really so, Gen. Buller will have to find some other way of reaching Gen. White, otherwise Ladysmith, so long beleaguered, must fall into the hands of the Boers. They on their side are apparently reluctant to attempt the capture by assault and are trying to starve out the garrison. On the west, General Methuen has made no further attempt to reach Kimberley. The Boers have surrounded him and have dug trenches on all sides to cut him off from assistance. The ease with which the Boers have been able to obtain ammunition and other supplies, has aroused the suspicion that the Portuguese authorities at Delagoa Bay are in sympathy with them. It was reported, but afterwards denied, that the British Government had made an arrangement with Portugal to acquire temporary possession of it. Such an arrangement would be greatly to the advantage of England, but it is doubtful whether in view of possible European complications Portugal could venture to grant the concession. Among the interesting incidents of the war is that of the capture of Lady Sarah Wilson by the Boers. She was in Mafeking with her husband when the place was invested and decided to stay with him. She has been serving as a hospital nurse and has also been war-correspondent of an English journal. When she was made prisoner, she was making a ride of two hundred miles to send a letter to the journal. She belongs to the family of the Duke of Marlborough, being an aunt of the present Duke. The Boers, however, made light of her aristocratic lineage and willingly exchanged her for a Boer woman who had fallen into British hands. Welcome as her liberty would be to her, the high-born dame probably felt the humiliation of being exchanged for an ordinary farmer's wife, but the Boers could not be expected to form their estimates of value on the principles of English society. To them Lady Sarah was merely an English woman and an enemy. So the patrician lady had to learn the lesson of equality which in any case, all must learn in the great day when God will judge not according to rank, but according to character.

BRIEF NOTES

The world's total of Young Men's Christian Associations increased during the past year from 6,698 to 7,226.

Prof. Roentgen, the discoverer of the rays which bear his name, has been appointed to a chair in the University of Munich.

Evangelist E. P. Telford is conducting revival services this week in Boston, Mass. Letters addressed to him at this office will be forwarded to him.

Mrs. J. M. Johnston, of Chicago, is the winner of the first prize offered by the Woman's National Sabbath Alliance, for the best essay on Religious Training in the School.

Dr. L. W. Munhall's services at Wilkes Barre were full of interest to the end. At one of his meetings for men only, two hundred young men stood up and pledged themselves for Christ.

John G. Paton, the veteran missionary, says that many native converts in the New Hebrides have given all that they have saved from their earnings for thirteen years to the fund for getting out an edition of the Bible.

The population of France, if not decreasing is practically stationary. The number of births during 1898 was less than the number in 1897 by 15,174. In Germany, during the same year, the excess of births over deaths was 846,871.

Dr. J. G. Butler, pastor of the Lutheran Memorial Church in Washington, D. C., has celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his acceptance of the pastorate. He has been chaplain of both houses of Congress and has filled other honorable offices.

A committee of Japanese gentlemen has collected funds to erect a memorial to Dr. G. F. Verbeck, who labored for nearly forty years in the cause of Christ in Japan. The memorial is a shaft of gray granite twelve feet high, bearing a suitable inscription.

The number of total abstainers in the British army now serving in South Africa is a much larger proportion of the entire force than has ever been known in a campaign. A Welch regiment takes the lead with one-half its number pledged teetotalers.

Mr. John D. Rockefeller has contributed the sum of $10,000 to the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute. Half of the amount is to be used in meeting last year's deficit, which was caused by the erection of necessary buildings and improvements.

The Moravians have now 138 stations in their foreign mission field and 54 out-stations. The American and European missionaries number 376 and the native helpers 1,942. The baptized members number 92,071, and the communicants, 33,764. The income last year amounted to $392,530.

The American Board has lost two distinguished and faithful workers. It has received news from Micronesia of the death of Mrs. Logan, of Ruk, and from North China of the death of Mrs. E. E. Aiken. The latter was only twenty-eight years old, but she had proved a missionary of rare tact and zeal.

The Presbyterian Mission in Korea was established only fourteen years ago. During the last year 1,153 members were received, and 3,000 catechumens were enrolled. In the Pyeng Yang district alone the people built during the year 44 houses of worship. The total church membership is now 2,079.

The sudden death is announced of Rev. Henry C. Simmons, D.D., President of Fargo College. He had many friends in the East, and a host in Minnesota and North Dakota to whom the news of his death will be cause of deep sorrow. He was only fifty-four years old and was in the prime of his activity and usefulness.

As stated elsewhere, Mr. Moody's eldest son, Will R. Moody, has undertaken the preparation of a biography of the great evangelist. Any of our readers knowing of facts or data that would be serviceable, or of anecdotes of Mr. Moody's work, are invited to forward the same to Will R. Moody at East Northfield, Mass.

ON THE WAY TO CALIFORNIA

MISS MEECHIM and Dorothy looked brighter and happier as every revolution of the wheels brought us nearer their old home, and they talked about Robert Strong and other old friends I never see.

"A NEW PAIR OF CUFFS"

"Be it ever so humbly,
There is no place like hum."

My heart sung them words and carried two parts, one sulferino and one bear tone. The high part caused by my lofty emotions and sweet recollections of home, that hallowed spot; the minor chords caused by feelin's I have so often recapitulated. Tommy, as the day wore on, went to sleep, and I covered him tenderly on the seat with my little shoulder shawl, and sot there alone; alone, as the cars bore us onward, sometimes through broad green fields of alfalfa, anon over a bridge half a mile long, from whence you could look down and see the flowing stream beneath like a little skein of silver yarn glistening in the sun fur below, agin forests and valleys and farms and homesteads, and anon in an opening through a valley, high bluffs, beautifully colored, could be seen towering up over blue waters, up, up as if they wuz bent on touching the fleecy clouds overhead. And then a green sheltered valley, and then a high range of mountains seen fur off as if overlookin' things to see that all wuz well, anon a big city, then a village, then the green country agin, and so the pictures passed before me as I sot there.

I had put on a pair of new cuffs and a collar, made for me and hemstitched by Waitstill Webb, and gin to me by her, though I wanted to pay her. Sweet little creeter! how good she wuz to me and to everybody, and I thought of her sad history, and hoped that brighter days wuz ahead on her. I d'no as I've told the reader much about her history, and mebby I might as well whilst we are rushin' on so fast, and Tommy is asleep.

Waitstill Webb and Alan Thorne

Alan Thorne, the young man she wuz engaged to, wuz brung up by a uncle who had a family of his own to love and tend to, but he did his duty by Alan, gin him a good education and a comfortable, if not affectionate, home in his family. But it wuz a big family all bound up in each other, and Alan had seemed like one who looks on through a winder at the banquet of Life and Love, kinder hungry and lonesome till he met Waitstill Webb. Then their two hearts and souls rushed together like two streams of water down an inclined plane. They literally seemed to be two bodies with one heart, one soul, one desire, one aspiration. He had always been industrious, honest and hard workin'. Now he had sunthin' to work for; and for the three years after he met Waitstill he worked like a giant. He wuz earning a home for his wife, his idol; how happy he wuz in his efforts, his work, and how happy she wuz to see it, and to work herself in her quiet way for the future.

He had bought a home about a mile out of the city, where he was employed, and had got it all payed for. It wuz a beautiful little cottage with a few acres of land round it, and he had got his garden all laid out and a orchard of fruit trees of all kinds, and trees and flowering shrubs and vines around the pretty cottage. There wuz a little pasture where he wuz to keep his cow and a horse, that she could take him with to his work mornings and drive round where she wanted to, and there wuz a meadow lot with a little rivulet running through it, and they had already planned a rustic bridge over the dancing stream, and a trout pond, and she had set out on its borders some water lilies, pink and white, and Showy Ladies and other wild flowers, and she jest doted on her posy garden and strawberry beds, and they'd bought two or three hives of bees in pretty boxes and took them out there; they had rented the place to a old couple till they wanted it themselves. And every holiday and Sunday they walked out to their own place, and the sun did not shine any brighter on their little home than the sun of hope and happiness did in their hearts as they pictured their life there in that cozy nest.

And Alan Thorne, after he loved Waitstill, not only tried to win outward success for her sake; he tried to weed out all the weaknesses of his nater, to make himself more worthy of her. He said to himself when he would go to see her, he would "Robe his soul in holiest purpose as for God himself." His pa had at one time in his life drank considerable, but he wuz not a drunkard, and he wuz a good bizness man when the fever carried him off, and his young wife out of the world the same year. Well, Alan wuz jest as industrious as he could be, and with his happy future to look forward to and Waitstill's love and beloved presence to prop up his manhood, everything promised a fair and happy life for them both; till, like a thunder-cloud out of a clear sky come that deafening report from Spanish brutality that blew up the Maine and this nation's peace and tranquility. Dretful deed! Awful calamity! that sent three hundred of our brave seamen onprepared to meet their God—without a second's warning. Awful deed that cried to heaven for pity. But did it bring back these brave fellows sleeping in Havana harbor to their mothers, wives and sweethearts, to have thousands more added to the list of the slain?

"Remember the Maine!" How these words echoed from pulpit and Senate and palace and hovel; how they wuz sung in verse, printed in poems, printed in flaming lines of electric light everywhere! From city to country, you saw and heard these words, "Remember the Maine!"

I wondered then and I wonder now if the spirit of revenge that swep' through our nation at that time wuz the spirit of the Master.

I d'no nor Josiah don't, whether it wuz right and best to influence the souls of the young till they burnt at white heat with the spirit that our Lord said his disciples must avoid, for said he: "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord."

A Deep Question

Well, it is a deep question, deeper than I've got a line to measure: and Josiah's line and mine both tied together don't begin to touch the bottom on't, for we've tried it time and agin. We've argyed aginst each other about it, and jined on and hitched our arguments together, and they didn't touch bottom then, nor begin to. As Mrs. Browning said (a woman I set store by, and always did, I've hearn Thomas J. read about her so much): "A country's a thing men should die for at need."

Yes, to die for, if its safety is imperiled, that I believe and Josiah duz, but I have eppisoded about it a sight, I've had to, methought how this nation wuz stirred its deepest depths; how it seethed a boiled with indignation and wrath b cause three hundred of its sons wuz kill by ignorant and vicious means; how breathed out vengeance on the cause th slew them: how it called: "To arms! arms! Remember the Maine!" But ho cool and demute it stood, or ruther sc and see every year sixty thousand of i best sons slain by the saloon, ten-fo more cruel deaths, too, since the soul a mind wuz slain before their bodies wer No cry for vengeance as the long proce sion of the dead wheeled by the doors the law-makers of the land; no cry: "T arms! to arms! Remember the Saloon And more mysterious still, I eppisoded myself, it would have looked to see th Government rig out and sell to the Spa iards a million more bombs and unde ground mines to blow up the rest of o ships and kill thousands more of o young men. Wouldn't it have looked dc queer to the other nations of the world t have seen it done?

The Nation's Call

But there they sot, our law-makers, an if they lifted their eyes at all to witne the long procession of the dead drift b sixty thousand corpses yearly slain by th Saloon, if they lifted their eyes at all to loo at the ghastly procession, they droppe 'em agin quick as they could so's not t delay their work of signin' licenses, mal in' new laws, fixin' over old ones, an writin' permits to the murderers to go o with their butchery. Queer sight! quee in the sight of other nations, in the sigl of men and angels, and of me and Josial

Well, to stop eppisodin' and resoor backwards for a spell. Alan Thorn hearn that cry: "To arms! To arms Remember the Maine!" And his very sou listened. His grandfathers on both side wuz fighting men; at school and colleg he'd been trained in a soldier regimen and had been steeped full of warlik idees, and they all waked up at this cr for vengeance. He had just got to go he had to; it wuz to be. Heaven an Waitstill couldn't help it; he had to go he went.

Well, Waitstill read his letters as we as she could through her blindin' tears letters at first full of love—the very pas sion of love and tenderness for his sweet heart, and deathless patriotism and lov for his country.

But bime-by the letters changed a littl in their tones—they wuzn't so full of lov for his country. "The country," so h writ, "wuz shamefully neglecting its sons, neglecting their comfort." He writ they wuz herded together in quarters not fit for a dog, with insufficient food; putrid, dretful food, that no dog would or could at. No care taken of their health—and s for the health of their souls, no matter here they wuz, if half starved or half lad, the Canteen was always present ith 'em; if they could git nothin' else r their comfort, they could always git e cup that the Bible sez: "Cursed is he at puts it to his neighbor's lips." Doubly cursed now—poisoned with adulteraon, makin' it a still more deadly pizen.

"WAITSTILL READ HIS LETTERS"

Well, sickened with loathsome food he ould not eat, half starved, the deadly phoid hovering over the wretched solier, is it any wonder that as the tempter eld the glass to his lips (the tempter be- g the Government he wuz fightin' for) he tempted yielded and drank?

The letters Waitstill got grew shorter nd cooler, as the tempter led Alan deepr and deeper into his castle of Ruin here the demon sets and gloats over its ictims. When the Canteen had done its ork on the crazed brain and imbruted ody, other sins and evils our Government ad furnished and licensed, stood ready o draw him still further along the downrade whose end is death.

A Canteen Tragedy

Finally the letters stopped, and then Waitstill, whose heart wuz broke, jined the noble army of nurses and went forward to the front, always hunting for the ne beloved, and, as she feared, lost to er. And she found him. The very day hat Alan Thorne, in a drunken brawl, killed Arvilly's husband with a bullet neant for another drunken youth, these vimmen met. A rough lookin' soldier knelt down by the dead man, a weepin' woman fell faintin' on his still, dead heart; this soldier ('twas Arville) wuz sick n bed for a week, Waitstill tendin' him, or her I might as well say, for Arville owned to her in her weakness that she wuz a woman; yes, Waitstill tended her faithfully, white and demute with agony, but kep' up with the hope that the Government that had ruined her lover would be lenitent towards the crime it had caused. For she reasoned it out in a woman's way. She told Arvilly "that Alan would never have drank had not the Government put the cup to his lips, and of course the Government could not consistently condemn what it had caused to be." She reasoned it out from what she had learnt of justice and right in the Bible.

But Arvilly told her—for as quick as she got enough strength she wuz the same old Arvilly agin, only ten times more bent on fightin' aginst the Drink Demon that murdered her husband. Sez Arvilly: "You don't take into consideration the Tariff and Saloon arguments of apologizin' Church and State, the tax money raised from dead men, and ruined lives and broken hearts to support poorhouses and jails and police to take care of their victims." No; Waitstill reasoned from jest plain Bible, but of course she found out her mistake. Arvilly said to her: "You'll find that the nation that opens its sessions with prayer, and engraves on its money, 'In God We Trust,' don't believe in such things at all. You'll find that their prayers are to the liquor dealers; their God is the huge idol of Expediency.

Alan Thorne wuz hung for the murder, that over Alan Thorne's name wuz printed:

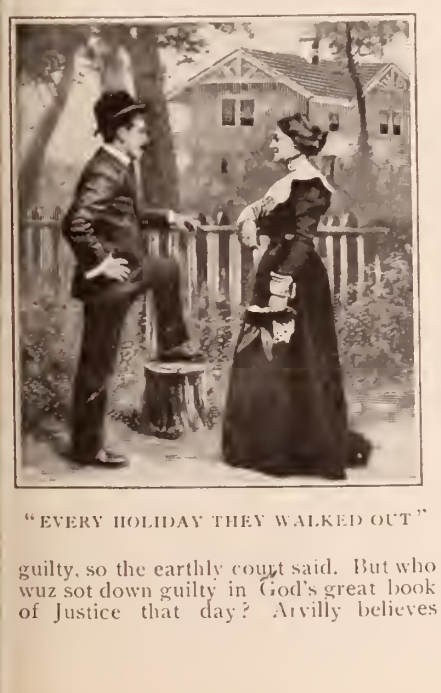
"Alan Thorne, foolish boy, tempted and ondone by the country he was trying to save." And then this sentence in fiery flame:

"The United States of America, guilty of murder in the first degree."

Dretful murder, to take the life of the one that loved it and wuz tryin' to save it.

"Well, Arvilly's last thing to love wuz taken from her cruelly, and when she got strong enough she sot off for Jonesville in her soldier clothes, for she thought she would wear 'em till she got away, but she wuz brung back as a deserter and Waitstill stood by her durin' her trial, and after Alan's death she wuz too smit down, like a posy in a cyclone. Arvilly, in her own clothes now, tended her like a mother, and as soon as she wuz able to travel took her back to Jonesville, where they make their home together, two widders, indeed, though the weddin' ring don't show on one of their hands.

Waitstill goes about doin' good, waitin' kinder still, some like her name, as I've told Josiah, till the Lord sends her relief by the angel that shall stand one day in all our homes. She don't talk much.



"EVERY HOLIDAY THEY WALKED OUT"

guilty, so the earthly court said. But who wuz sot down guilty in God's great book of Justice that day? Arvilly believes

"WHAT A PANORAMA IT WUZ—BEAUTIFUL, GRAND, DELIGHTFUL!"

Arvilly's Grief

But Arvilly's grief is different. She told me one day when I wuz tellin' her to try and chirk up and be more cheerful and comfortable:

Sez she, "I don't want to be comfortable; I don't want to feel any different."

"Whyee, Arvilly!" sez I, "don't you want to see any happiness agin?"

"No, I don't," sez she. "I don't want to take a minute's comfort and ease while things are in the state they be." Sez she, "Would you want to set down happy, and rock, and eat peanuts, if you knew that your husband and children wuz drowndin' out in the canal?"

"No," sez I, "no, indeed! I should rush out there bareheaded, and if I couldn't save 'em, would feel like dyin' with 'em."

"Well," sez she, short as pie crust, "that's jest how I feel."

I believe and so Josiah duz that Arvilly would walk right up to a loaded cannon and argy with it if she thought that it would help destroy the Saloon and the Canteen, and after she had convinced the cannon she would be perfectly willin' to be blowed up by it if the Saloon and Canteen wuz blowed up too.

An Alkali Diet

Well, I sot thinkin' of all this till Tommy waked up and we all went out into the dining car and had a good meal. We wuz a little over two days goin' from Salt Lake City to San Francisco, and durin' that time I calculated that I eat enough dirt, that bitter alkali sand, to last lawful all my life. I believe one peck of dirt is all the law allows one person to consume durin' their life. It seems as if I eat more than enough to meet legal requirements for me and Josiah, and I seemed to have a thick coatin' of it on my hull person. And poor little Tommy! I tried to keep his face clean and that wuz all I could do.

But as we drew nearer to California the weather became so balmy and delightful that it condoned for much that wuz onpleasant, and I sez to myself, the lovely views I have seen between Chicago and California I shall never forgit as long as memory sets up in her high chair.

A Panorama of Beauty

What a panorama it wuz—beautiful, grand, delightful, majestic, sublime—no words of mine can do it justice. No. I can never describe the views that opened on our admirin' and almost awe-struck vision as the cars advanced through natural openin's in the mountains and anon artificial ones.

Why, I had thought that the hill in front of old Grout Nickelsons wuz steep, and the road a skittish one that wound around it above the creek. But imagine goin' along a road where you could look down thousands of feet into running water, and right up on the other side of you mountains thousands of feet high. And you between, poor specks of clay with only a breath of steam to keep you agoin' and prevent your dashin' down into that enormous abyss.

But Grandeur sot on them mountain tops. Glory wuz enthroned on them sublime heights and depths, too beautiful for words to describe, too grand for human speech to reproduce agin, the soul felt it and must leave it to other souls to see and feel.

On, on through mountain, valley, gorge

"I ROCKED TOMMY AND SUNG TO HIM"

and summit, waves of green foliage, rocks all the beautiful colors of the rainbow, majestic shapes, seemin'ly fashioned for a home for the gods; white peaks—sunglorified, thousands of feet high with blue sky above; ravines thousands of feet deep with a glint of blue water in the depths, seemin' to mirror to us the truth that God's love and care wuz over and under us. And so on and ons; valleys, mountains, clear lakes, forests and broad green fields, tree sheltered farms, and anon the broad prairie. It wuz all a panorama I never tired of lookin' at, and lasted all the way to California.

"A San Francisco Tarven"

As our stay wuz to be so short in San Francisco, Miss Meechim and Dorothy thought that it would be best to go to a hotel instead of openin' Dorothy's grand house; so we all went to the tarven Miss Meechim picked out, the beautifulest tarven that ever I sot eyes on, it seemed to me, and the biggest one. Havin' felt the swayin', jiggerin' motion of the cars so long, it wuz indeed a blessin' to set my feet on solid ground once more, and Tommy and I wuz soon ensconced in a cozy room, nigh Miss Meechim's sweet rooms. For she still insisted on callin' their rooms sweet, and I wouldn't argy with her, for I spoze they did seem sweet to her.

Tommy wuz tired out and I had to take him in my arms and rock him, after we'd had our supper, a good meal which Miss Meechim had brung up into their settin'-room, though I insisted on payin' my part on't (she's a good creater, though weak in some ways). Well I rocked Tommy and sung to him:

"Sweet fields beyond the swellin' flood."

And I most know them sweet fields in my mind wuz our own orchard and paster, and the swellin' flood I thought on wuzn't death's billers, but the waters that rolled between California and Jonesville.

Not one word had I hearn from my pardner sence leavin' New York.

"Oh, dear Josiah! When shall I see thee agin?" So sung my heart, or ruther chanted, a deep solemn chant. "Where art thou Josiah, and when shall we meet agin? And why, why do I not hear from thee?"

A New Year's Strain

PRAISE God for the year that is past
Praise him for each blessing it brought us;
And, now that 'tis ended at last,
Praise God for each lesson it taught us.

We lived through the year that is past,
In spite of our doubting and fearing:
God's mercy, from first till the last,
Was graciously, skilfully steering.

Recalling the year that is past,
The new we will joyously enter.
As long as life's journey may last
Our trust upon God we will center.

Questions of the Week

1. At what age may a young person be properly admitted to all the privileges of church membership?

This, of course, must depend largely on individual character. Almost as soon as a child can distinguish between the principles of right and wrong. Bishop William Taylor was converted when only eight years old, and Matthew Simpson at the age of thirteen. Both were as much entitled to the privileges of church membership as persons of maturer years. It is a fatal mistake to exclude from church membership those of whom our Saviour said: "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." As partaking of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper is one privilege of church membership, there should be an intelligent appreciation of the purpose and meaning of that solemn service, but children are as capable in this direction as many adults.

2. Is it possible for a backslider to be lost?

To make an absolute declaration that a backslider cannot possibly be lost, seems like arrogating omniscience to oneself. We may surely tell the backslider who is concerned about his state, that divine mercy will receive and restore him. May we not, also, believe where a soul has been born again and passed from death unto life, but has backsliden, God, in his infinite mercy, will devise means for bringing him back. The process of restoration may be accompanied by great bitterness and anguish of soul on the part of the wanderer. The testimony of many who have been restored bears out this suggestion. Nothing in God's Word warrants recklessness in regard to one's salvation whether he has ever or never been a Christian. S. T. BROWN.

3. What are the exact figures showing the comparative strength of the Spanish and American fleets at the battle of Manila Bay?

The Spanish fleet at the battle of Manila was much larger than that of the United States. The fleets were as follows:

Spanish vessels: Isla de Luzon (protected cruiser)—Steel, 1,030 tons displacement; armed with four 4.7-inch guns and three torpedo tubes. Isla de Cuba (protected cruiser)—Steel, 1,030 tons displacement; armed with four 4.7-inch guns and three torpedo tubes. Reina Christina—Steel, 3,520 tons displacement; armed with six 6.2-inch, two 2.7-inch guns and five torpedo tubes. Castilla—Wood, 3,342 tons displacement; armed with four 6-inch, two 4.7-inch, two 3.3-inch, four 3-inch guns and two torpedo tubes. Velasco—Iron, 1,152 tons displacement; armed with three 6-inch and two 2.7-inch guns; no torpedo tubes. The gunboats in the Spanish fleet were of steel and each carried four small guns. The names were as follows: Don Juan d' Austria, Don Antonio, General Lezo, Marquis del Cucro, El Careo, Isla de Mindano, Isla d' Ulloa.

Compared to the Spanish fleet, that of the United States was small in number, but nearly as strong and certainly more effective, if one takes into consideration the armament of our vessels. Their names and the number of their guns follow: Olympia (protected cruiser)—Steel, 5,870 tons displacement, armed with four 8-inch, ten 5-inch guns and six torpedo tubes. Boston (partly protected)—Steel, 3,200 tons displacement; armed with two 8-inch and six 6-inch guns. Raleigh (protected cruiser)—Steel, 3,200 tons displacement; armed with one 6-inch, ten 5-inch guns and six torpedo tubes. Baltimore (protected cruiser)—Steel, 4,400 tons displacement; armed with four 8-inch, six 6-inch guns and five torpedo tubes. Gunboat Concord—Steel, 1,700 tons displacement; armed with six 6-inch guns and two torpedo tubes. Gunboat Petrel—Steel, 1,890 tons displacement; armed with four 6-inch guns. Revenue Cutter McCullough—Steel, 1,500 tons displacement; four 4-inch guns.

The Spaniards had twelve vessels in all, while we had but seven, and their cruisers were larger than any of ours except the Baltimore and the Olympia, which are of the first class. Yet their gunboats were inferior to ours in size and armament, and the guns aboard their cruisers were of old-fashioned make. Still, had their gunners been well trained, the fleet could certainly have inflicted severe damage on our vessels.

4. Should Sabbath observance be so strict as to preclude the pleasure of a walk in the woods, field or garden, between services, for those who have no such opportunity during the week?

The principle laid down by Christ that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath" would seem to permit the taking of such walks for the purpose of exercise and recreation. The apparent difficulty of determining aright such questions arises from the improper identification of the Jewish Sabbath with the Christian Lord's day. They are not the same either in origin, purpose, or mode of their observance. The sole and original purpose of the former was to furnish a day of cessation from labor (Exod. 20: 8-11; 31: 13-18; 16: 23-30.) Its subsequent religious observance was incident to resting. But the Christian Sunday, or more properly the Lord's day, is primarily for religious activity, both in worship and by good deeds done to our fellows, as was shown by Christ's words and actions in healing on the Sabbath day. Anything, therefore, which does not prevent us from performing these duties, or which aids us in performing them may lawfully be done on the Lord's day (Matt. 12: 1-8; Luke 6: 1-10; and John 7: 23.) For inasmuch as the Master plainly teaches that it is lawful to do good on the Sabbath—which was so repugnant to the ideas of Sabbath observance held by the Pharisees, that we learn "they were filled with madness"—why may we not do that which is clearly for our own mental and physical well-being after having fulfilled our duties to worship him? At the same time we should be careful not to so exercise our liberty as to cause some weak brother to offend. The apostle teaches us that some things are lawful and yet not expedient. H. C. UNDERHILL.

5. Has capital punishment been abolished in any State of the Union? If so, in what States and when?

The death penalty for murder prevails in all States of the Union except Colorado, Rhode Island (abolished 1852), Maine, (abolished 1876, restored 1883, reabolished 1887), Michigan (abolished 1847), Wisconsin, (abolished 1853). New York and Iowa abolished it, but subsequently restored it. In New York and Ohio the punishment is inflicted by electricity, in all the other States by hanging. The restoration act in Maine was carried by a bare constitutional majority, the reabolishing act by a three-fourth vote. In Iowa (by an act passed in 1872), it is at the option of the jury to say whether the penalty shall be death. O. B. BIRD.

6. May it not be considered as possible for Christian parents to so train their children as to make absolutely sure of their moral and spiritual welfare?

No parental training can of itself absolutely assure the morality or the salvation of any child. Training can do much towards securing both, but does not by any process of evolution or otherwise develop into that regeneration which is necessary to salvation. Given absolute faithfulness in the training and faith to plead God's covenant promises in prayer, parents can justly count upon their children's moral and spiritual welfare. In this assurance they are building on the foundation of God's Word. R. FORD.

7. What five or seven hymns in the English language have been most helpful to English-speaking Christians?

The result of the study of many lists received in response to this question gives the following list of seven hymns: 1. "Jesus, Lover of My Soul, 93 per cent.; 2. "Rock of Ages Cleft for Me," 87 per cent.; 3. "Nearer, My God, to Thee," 53 per cent.; 4. "There is a Fountain Filled With Blood," 50 per cent.; 5. "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," 36 per cent.; 6. "Just as I Am, Without One Plea," 30 per cent.; 7. "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," 23 per cent. The percentages represent the proportion of the lists in which these hymns were found. Two friends have six of the elect hymns upon their lists—Lou G. Findley and Lydia M. Arnold. The hymns selected by the former have received the larger aggregate of votes. No correspondent managed to select all seven of the elect hymns. EDITOR.

8. Name the verse of Scripture which most explicitly states the doctrine of Christ's substitution.

"For Christ, also, hath once suffered for sins—the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit." I. Peter 3: 18. This verse sets forth: 1. The reason of the substitution—"for sins." 2. The manner of the substitution—"put to death." 3. The purpose of the substitution—"to bring us to God." 4. The character of those for whom the substitution was made—"unjust." 5. The character of the Substitute—a. "The Just." b. Christ: "anointed," Divine. LOUIS L. SHAFFER.

Other explicit passages on the same subject are Isaiah 53: 5 and I. Peter 2: 24.—EDITOR.

9. Is the breaking of a solemn engagement of marriage ever justifiable?

Plighted troth is a sacred and responsible obligation and should be binding to both parties unless some very sufficient reason justifies its annulment. It is not only contemptible, but dishonorable, even criminal, to allow its sanctity to be violated by light trivial causes. True manhood, chaste womanhood, should scorn to enter into so holy a covenant without serious advisement—having proper regard for the important state it imposes. But the intelligent mind can readily appreciate bars that would prevent an engagement from being consummated—where honor is more in the breach than in the observance. Intrigue, deception or coercion makes marriage a prostitution. Designing, malevolent interest may seek and win favor where it would not dare aspire were not certain dark facts or history concealed. The true conditions being apprehended, honor's purity would shrink, and rightly so, from making an unhallowed alliance. Highest interest, noblest conservation demand that existing bonds be promptly dissolved, and such action should receive the indorsement of all who love and revere so holy an institution.

10. Is a church justified in holding a fair to raise money for church purposes?

There is nothing out of place in holding a sale of useful and fancy articles for the benefit of the church. Many persons can contribute labor upon such articles, where they cannot give the worth of them in money; while other persons find use for the articles so made, and can reasonably be expected to purchase them. It is better not to hold fairs in a house of worship. All lotteries or transactions savoring of chance or undue pressure to buy because the cause to be benefited is a good one are wrong. No right-minded Christian will feel that an article bought at a fair, where value is received for money outlaid, is a gift to the Lord. We are not giving that for which we secure an adequate return. L. REEVES.

Miscellaneous Questions

A. J. H. Audubon, Tex. What is the diplomatic language of to-day?

In Continental Europe, and throughout the Old World generally, French is almost universally recognized as the language of diplomacy. At official audiences, conferences and international assemblages of an official character, it is used almost exclusively.

M. D. G., Garner, Ia. 1. How many parables were spoken and miracles performed by Jesus during the three years of his teaching? 2. Did Jesus ever eat and drink after his resurrection and where is it recorded?

1. Fifty parables are noted in the Gospels. Twenty-four miracles are specifically mentioned as having been performed by Christ; but many more are implied, as see Luke 7: 21, 22; Matt. 4: 23, 24; Matt. 14: 14 and 15: 30; Mark 1: 34; Luke 6: 17-19. 2. See Luke 24: 43.

Louis W., Whittier, Calif., writes:

Permit me to answer the question, which you answer in the negative, i. e., "Is it wrong for a Christian to pick hops?" Having lived in a hop region and heard this question discussed continually for years, and having witnessed beyond a doubt the curse of God upon that region, in a financial collapse from which the community did not emerge for at least fifteen years, in which everybody suffered and many lost their farms under mortgage (to say nothing of the immoral results which always attend the gathering together of all classes and influences in picking time), I would unhesitatingly say, "Yes, it is wrong." For every pound of hops used for legitimate purposes, ninety-nine are used to make beer.

Wishful, E. Nanticoke, Pa. 1. If I marry a widow, she having children by her first husband, am I compelled by law as a stepfather to support the stepchildren until they have attained the age of twenty-one years? 2. Can I, as a stepfather by law, have a right to claim the stepchildren's wages until they are at the age of twenty-one years? 3. In all matters, am I as a stepfather responsible to and for all actions, mischief, sickness or otherwise for stepchildren until they have reached twenty-one years? 4. If a married man is living an unhappy life with his wife—faults on both sides—is a wife justified in absence and unknowingly to her husband in removing all the household goods to her parents or otherwise leaving an empty house for the husband to come home to?

1. A stepfather is not compellable to support stepchildren generally. If he adopts them legally, he is liable, just as if they were his own. And if, without formal adoption, he has supported them so long as to raise the presumption of adoption, he might, in that case, be held liable. 2. Stepfather has no right to stepchild's wages unless there has been an adoption, or perhaps unless he is supporting the stepchild as a member of his family. 3. Stepfather is not liable for stepchild's mischief, unless the stepchild has been adopted expressly or by implication as above, and not then, except in a case where he would be liable for the mischief of his own child. 4. Wife is not justified in case stated in removing household goods. "Wishful," would do well to consult a good lawyer in the place where he lives, as the foregoing answers may require modification in some of the States of the Union.

Cuban Housekeeping

SOME of our thorough-going New England matrons; some of our progressive Western women, representatives of the best, in both cases, which America has to offer in culture and conscience, are now resident in tropical Cuba. Their husbands have gone there for business purposes or in a governmental position, or they have sought in Cuba for themselves a niche where they may do missionary work. The other day I heard from a very proud and quite youthful grandmother who had gone to the bright Southern island that she might be with her daughter when the first baby came, and it was very entertaining to hear of the difference in dress needed by a wee thing just born in a Cuban home, and the outfit required by a young person of the same age in frosty Massachusetts. A Cuban bedroom does not surprise us by any novelty except that there must be a canopy over the couch to keep off mosquitoes, and every woman who lives anywhere in the mosquito belt of our own land has to provide the same thing, unless her windows and doors are effectually screened. Toilet accessories are everywhere the same, and are simple or luxurious according to the owner's purse and taste. A Cuban drawing-room is very dainty and charming, and by preference the floor is covered with cool matting, rather than with any heavier material.

A HAVANA CHEF

Cuban cookery is a very elaborate affair, and is noted for the profusion of pieces used. Steak, for instance, is taken by the chef, chopped into a fine mince, covered with grated almonds and little green peas, dashed with a bit of onion and garnished with raisins and cherries. Fancy the disgust of your good man at being seated before such a dish. Rice is used on every table, and no dinner is complete without fruit, a salad, and a thick sweet custard. Very black coffee is always served after dinner in the usual small cups. Chocolate, a favorite beverage, is very thick, smooth and sweet.

A beautiful adjunct of West Indian scenery is the cocoa palm, from which almost everything one needs may be made. The bark, peeled very thin, serves for writing paper. The leaves help to shingle the houses, which have thatched roofs. Ropes and strings are made of the cocoa husks, and the cocoanut itself is an important article of food. The Cuban cook finds the cocoanut indispensable for his desserts, one way in which he prepares it being by grating, flavoring with cinnamon, covering with sugar, and simmering the mass in his little charcoal oven.

The home cooking is generally done over a handful of charcoal in a brazier, and anything for which this does not serve, is sent to the public bakeshop.

I was present one day lately at a church meeting where the ladies took upon themselves the support of two missionaries in Cuba. CHRISTIAN HERALD readers know that there is deep and squalid poverty, want and ignorance in that beautiful land, owing to the long tyranny there exercised by Spain. In a few years let us hope that liberty, intelligence and pure religion will bring about a wonderful change for the better in the condition of the poorer people, and in the enlightenment of the masses, as well as in the education of the children.

Is it Wrong?

Is what wrong? Why, to use powder on the face as a beautifier. It is said to be rather the fashion just now to use something worse than powder, namely, rouge. If wrong, why is it wrong?

Well, to begin with, it is wrong because those who use powder and paint to make their faces attractive are not quite honest. They want to be more comely than they are. They are vain. They try, but they never succeed in the attempt to deceive their friends as to their age. They imagine they can cheat old Father Time and take ten years off their faces by cosmetics carefully applied. The effort is useless, friends. We look about our age, all of us, and we may as well be resigned to it, and seek the advantages of your age, for each period has its special attractions.

A CUBAN BEDROOM

Next, powder clogs the pores of the skin, chokes up the delicate lace-like texture, and keeps the skin from throwing off impurities. A beautiful skin must owe its beauty to good health, and to careful washing and entire cleanliness. The woman who bathes will not need powder.

To think too much about how one looks seems to me very silly and a sinful waste of time when there is so much work to be done in this world of ours

"Nine tenths of the women one sees have never learned how to walk," said an observing man the other day. "They trot along as if they were mechanical toys wound up and set in motion, or they drag themselves on as if they were too weary to move, or they zigzag over a sidewalk as if they were describing curves. To see a pretty girl craning her head forward so that she has the effect of a turtle poking his head out of a shell, projecting her abdomen and rounding her shoulders, gives one a heartache. Head up, young lady; shoulders back, stomach in, and step forward with a free swing, as if you were afraid of nobody. A flat back is a great beauty in a girl."

So said my friend. I pondered whether we train our young daughters as we should in graceful walking.

Good Manners in School

A Western school, the Waterloo High School of Indiana, has recently adopted a code of rules for deportment, which commends itself to me as eminently judicious, I should like to visit the Waterloo young people.

1. We will not communicate, nor ask to communicate while in the school building.
2. We will keep refined positions in our school seats.
3. We will cultivate a light step.
4. We will not ask for individual favors.
5. We will prepare all writing material in the morning.
6. We will make the school room a place of quietude.

These rules on general manners also have been signed:

1. We will not allow others to be more polite to us than we are to them.
2. We will not make ourselves odious in the use of tobacco.

And here are some street manners:

1. We will, on passing people in the street, give them half of the walk.
2. We will not jeer at any one on the street or off the street.
3. We, the gentlemen, will tip our hats to ladies.
4. We will avoid being boisterous wherever we may be.

Our Letter-Box

—MINERVA. All professional text-books are expensive. If you live near a public library you may find reference books there.

—JESSIE C. R. I thank you for your very sweet and pleasant words of appreciation lately sent.

—ARTHUR HENRY. You may send a girl a book, or flowers, but not jewelry, or any article of personal wearing apparel.

—BETSY BROWN. Ingrowing nails are caused by a too short shoe. Your shoe should project a little beyond your foot.

—INQUIRER. Write to "The Presbyterian Hospital," and state the case, or to "The New York Hospital." Both are in New York City.

—FANNIE E. F. Did you ever get another pet, in place of the splendid dog you lost? I do not wonder that you were grieved at his death.

—MOTHER. A little girl in cold weather wears a bonnet which covers her ears and the back of her neck. Her hair should be braided, unless it curls naturally.

—JANE DARLING. Try pulled bread; it is easily digested. You must take the ordinary loaf, pull it into long irregular pieces, and dry them in the oven all day.

A PARLOR IN A CUBAN HOME, HAVANA

THE DESERT PLACE

Mark 6: 31

TAKEN aside by Jesus, dear heart,
With a touch of his loving hand;
And a gentle "Come ye yourselves apart,"
Which you and I understand.
The pathway seems so lone and drear,
Till we see his tender face:
But you and I will be stronger, dear,
For the rest in the "desert place."

He gently leads us away with him
From all that has been so dear;
Our hearts are sore and our eyes are dim,
But he dries the falling tear.
Tenderly raising our weary heads,
He says, "Ye shall rest awhile;"
And, oh! the radiance which he sheds
In the tenderness of his smile.

It lights with glory the desert place;
It brings to us rest and peace;
We see the image of God's own face,
And tears and sighings cease.
Then, when he leads us out again,
Our lives will be bright and clear,
Because of the "desert of grief and pain"
With only our Saviour near.—E. M. T.

The Stepmother

"BEWARE," said Samuel Weller, in Pickwick Papers, "of a widow."

"Do tell all girls," writes a much tried young stepmother, "to beware of a widower with children."

Our sympathies flow so naturally and strongly toward the children who have lost their own dear mother, and whose portion in life is to be governed by her successor, that we often forget that the stepmother is herself in need of compassion. She is exposed to criticism on every hand. If she reproves the children or corrects them, even more gently than their own mother would have done in similar circumstances, onlookers cry out at her severity. She is an object of curiosity, if not of suspicion. The fact is that a woman to be a good stepmother needs to have qualities of a very high order, love, patience, gentleness, and, above all, unselfishness. Then she must have Christian faith, trusting Jesus every day and all the way for the wisdom she needs.

The stepmother's husband is in a difficult position, too. He sometimes finds himself in danger of taking sides unjustly. He is his children's father, and doubly bound to them, their own mother being in heaven, and if he allow himself to be harsh in manner or dealings with them, because of his wife's complaints of their behavior, he is very much to blame. But he is his wife's husband, and must not suffer her to be treated with disrespect or insubordination by his children, whom she has consented to care for. If the couple have children of their own, there is great reason to guard against discrimination in their favor as contrasted with older children in the family.

I shall be glad to hear from any stepmother whose experience can be useful to my friend. Particularly, as her greatest vexations arise from the conduct of her two young stepdaughters, aged fourteen and sixteen, some wise mother may show her a path in which it may be easy to walk. I myself consider a girl of fourteen too old for any discipline except that of gentle reasoning. She cannot be helped by scolding; she should not be sent to her room and fed on bread and water. At fourteen she is almost on the threshold of young womanhood. How shall the stepmother maintain her authority, when her husband ranges himself on his daughter's side? What do my readers think?

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

CHAPTER XI.

The Falling of the Shadow

THE school feast at Sudbrook was much like other school feasts, save in so far as it gained in orderliness and idyllic charm by the smallness of its numbers, and by the all-pervading presence of "our Miss Celia," who to the little ones was a good fairy—kind, but awful in power—and to every one was the life and soul of the simple festivity.

Douglas Lingard's lot in life had not hitherto brought him in the way of such a gathering, but he did not pity himself for the ordeal. Celia had said that she wanted him, and, even if he had been less in love, he would have liked the home-like feeling of being ordered about and set to work by her.

Caryl did not at first put in an appearance; he was said to be away on electioneering business, and Frank Allardyce with him. But Mr. Allardyce was here, there and everywhere—kindly and important; and Mrs. Locke was gliding about, waiting upon the children at tea, and talking to the mothers and fathers who strolled up in the course of the evening to watch the games.

Douglas did not like to see her, and afterwards felt a mingling of gratitude and annoyance when, by a bit of transparent feminine diplomacy, she contrived that he should take Celia back to the house to secure a cup of tea, after the children had all been fed and had set out to amuse themselves with renewed vigor.

It was a pleasant little interlude, no doubt, but he was rather dismayed to find that he had made it evident to an outsider that he liked to be with Celia —— being a simple young man, and not aware how obvious these things generally are.

And, considering how short the time was, Celia spent a good deal of it in talking to him about Mrs. Locke. Though Douglas had never complained of his uncle's temper, far less of his uncle's will, he had naturally spoken sometimes to so sympathetic a listener of his lonely childhood and lonelier youth, of his profession and his ambitions, and so forth. And now that for once they were alone together he would rather have talked of these things—or, better still, of Celia herself—than of Mrs. Locke and the length of time she had been with his uncle, and her antecedents generally.

He found himself, however, telling of his uncle's last illness and Caryl's return, and other matters with which Mrs. Locke was closely connected, but which verged so closely also upon those troubles of which he never meant to speak to any one, that he was actually rather relieved when Celia put down her cup and said that she must go back to the children.

As they entered the Home Close a laughing ring of little ones swept up to them, and carried Celia off, like a dance of chubby little Hours encircling a nymph or a Grace; and Douglas strolled away, to see whether he could further her wishes in any other direction.

Presently he met Mr. Allardyce walking by himself, looking, as Douglas fancied, tired and out of temper. His face was rather flushed, but something in it reminded the young man of what Martin had said of some very serious complaint from which Mr. Allardyce suffered, which his restless energy and somewhat noisy good-nature was apt to make his friends forget.

Douglas timed his pace to suit that of the elder man, and turned back with him into the shrubbery, lending a kindly ear to his somewhat confused remarks. He had been talking, it seemed, to one of the village worthies who had stepped up to look on at the children's play, and this man, who was a great local politician, had told him of some deep-laid scheme—of which Douglas, hearing of it thus, could make neither head nor tail—a scheme formed by a great Tory landlord in the neighborhood to destroy the chances of the Radical candidate.

So far as Douglas could gather, there seemed to be nothing worse going on than the usual electioneering tactics, such as his companion would probably have thought quite justifiable when used by his own side. But he had little time to think about the matter, for Mr. Allardyce suddenly stopped short, and laid a hand heavily upon his arm.

"I'm a fool," he said, speaking rather thickly. "I'm disturbing myself too much, and I've been warned again and again what would come of it. Help me to the house, there's a good fellow, if I can get as far; and don't say anything to anybody."

His face was still flushed, but with a patchy, unwholesome color; and his eyes were dull and misty. He swayed a little as he stood, and held out his hand gropingly, as though he could not quite see where his companion was.

Douglas caught the hand and drew it under his arm, willing enough to do all that youth and strength could do, but fervently wishing that some one else could turn up to share in the responsibility. No one was in sight, however; and as he begged Mr. Allardyce to lean heavily upon him, and they moved slowly towards the house, he was trying to recall what his landlady had poured into his unwilling ears as to the strange seizures to which his present charge was subject. If, as seemed likely, he was going to have what Mrs. Tomlinson called "some kind of a fit," it was some comfort at least to know that it had happened before and he had not died of it.

"I shan't get as far as the house," muttered the older man, after a moment. "There's a seat yonder—help me to that. And don't be scared: you've seen me as bad as this before."

Douglas was scared, too much so to be able to wonder just then why Mr. Allardyce should say that he had seen him in that state before. The seat was just reached, and the heavy form that he was supporting collapsed upon it, and the whole man, body and mind, seemed to sink into a trance of suspended animation. His eyes were half closed; it was obvious that he had as little power to speak as to move: and yet—without knowing why he thought so—Douglas felt sure that he had not altogether lost consciousness. His hands were cold, purple with cold, as though it had been December instead of July; and as the young man felt them and rubbed them between his own, he debated whether he dared leave him alone while bringing some one to his aid, or whether by raising a shout for help he might not bring on himself more spectators than assistants.

In spite of Mr. Allardyce's assurance that he had been as bad before, he looked to the younger man's inexperienced eyes as though he might die if the right thing was not done for him immediately. If some one would but come by, were it only a child who could be sent with a message! but in this lonely shrubbery-path every one was out of sight and out of hearing, and it might be hours before any foot strayed that way.

It was with intense relief that he heard a man's step, and looking round saw Martin Hamerton strolling moodily along, with bent head and hands locked behind him.

Douglas called softly, and in a moment Martin was beside him, looking concerned but not surprised.

"I've heard of this before," he said, bending over the sick man and helping to chafe his hands. "It's serious, no doubt, but nothing to be immediately alarmed at. We can't do much more than let him alone till he recovers sufficiently to walk to the house. It won't hurt him to sit here for a little, and Frank tells me that he hates to be dragged about or to have the servants see him in this state."

"He seems so cold!" said Douglas, who was shivering slightly himself, from pure nervousness.

"Yes; and I believe the recollection of being cold is all that remains with him after one of these attacks. If you don't mind staying here with him I'll fetch a carriage-rug from the house—I know where to find one—and some kind of stimulant would be a good thing, presently, when he is able to take it."

Martin hurried off; and almost before he had disappeared along the winding path it seemed to Douglass that a little more life came into the face he was so anxiously watching, and the hands lost something of that deadly chill. Presently they closed in his, very feebly, but as though clinging to the warmth and vigor that they found there, and the eyes opened a little wider, and moved, as if seeking his face.

"Stay with me, Lingard—don't you go away!" murmured Mr. Allardyce, so faintly that Douglass could not catch the words at first; but they were repeated with a little more strength and with fretful urgency, and he hastened to give his assurance that he was not going.

"Was that Frank that went away?" went on the sick man after a moment. "Keep him away—don't let him see me like this! I'll be better presently."

"It's all right. He is not here, he hasn't seen," said Douglas in a steady soothing tone, as though reassuring a child; not attempting further explanation.

"I'll be better presently," said Mr. Allardyce again. "But not to last—not to last. . . . I told you what it felt like—like a cold shadow creeping over me, ice-cold and dark. What's that they call it?—the Valley of the Shadow of Death. . . . And I see you through it, and hear you speak as if it were a thousand miles away. And, bit by bit, at last I get back and see daylight again. But one of these days I shan't get back, and there'll be an end of it."

He spoke very slowly and with effort; but it was only his tongue that tripped and stumbled; his mind was evidently clear enough, in some respects at any rate.

"I said there'll be an end of it," he went on, rather querulously, as Douglas did not reply. "But you know I don't mean that. I'm not an unbeliever; I never was an unbeliever. I know one should think more of those things, but it's hard to do it; hard when a man's been in the midst of business as I have, and it doesn't seem as easy when one's retired as I fancied it would be."

Still Douglas did not speak, yet not altogether because he had nothing to say. He had all a young man's intense dislike of seeming to preach, but never since his young master, John Ashburton, had touched and moulded his boyish spirit, had he found it hard to think of "those things," the things beyond the Valley of the Shadow. He made no claim to goodness; he was intensely conscious of a temper that was far from saintlike, but the unseen world had always had for him an intense reality.

"You might say something!" said Mr. Allardyce, in the same half-fretful tone. "You did last time. I don't remember now what it was, but it was very good, better than any parson. I thought then that when the time came that I must go down into the dark for good and all, I'd like you to be there."

The demand, considering all things, was pathetically that of the frightened child that, waking in the dark, cries for the voice and the words that have soothed it to sleep before. But Douglas was in no mood to take it so, for suddenly there flashed upon him the meaning of Mr. Allardyce's allusions to "the last time." Again he was being taken for his brother, in the dimness and confusion of the sick man's eyes and brain. It was Caryl who —it sent a kind of sickening thrill through him to realize what kind of words those must have been which his companion was trying to recall.

"Excuse me, sir," he said gently but rather coldly. "I think you must be mistaking me for my brother. I am only Douglas Lingard."

Mr. Allardyce started and looked feebly round.

"The other one?" he said. "I didn't know. I'm sure I thought it was Caryl. And can't you—?—Oh!—ah, well, never mind."

He partly withdrew himself from the young man's supporting arm, and Douglas bit his lip, knowing well what was meant by the half-involuntary movement. The sick man did not want spiritual consolation or even physical help from him, knowing now who he was; and there was a sting in his sudden change of tone.

It was doubly a relief at that moment to see Martin Hamerton hurrying towards them, with a rug on his arm.

All the serious side of the incident disappeared with his coming. He was sympathetic, but seemed to think it advisable to make as light of the matter as possible, as he tucked his patient up in the rug and advised five minutes' rest before walking up to the house. And Mr. Allardyce, now that he knew who was with him, seemed resolute to own to nothing more than a touch of faintness, such as no one need think twice about now that it was passing off.

The young men admired his courage, but did not want to tax it too heavily, and with a little significant glance at each other over his head, they vetoed his proposal that they should go back to the Close, declaring that they had had enough of the festivities; and after a few moments, when he rose slowly and rather unsteadily to his feet, they both went with him up to the Hall.

"I shall take the responsibility of sending for the doctor," said Martin, after they had left him in the library to rest. "Frank is not here, and the housekeeper is busy with the children, and there is no one else to see to him."

"Will he be annoyed at your having supposed him ill enough to want the doctor?" asked Douglas.

"Oh! Fosbrook will manage him. I know he drops in sometimes, 'accidentally,' just to keep an eye on him, and he can pretend he is doing so to-night."

Martin, to whom of course that house was sufficiently familiar, dived into some back region to write his note and find a messenger, and Douglas found his way back to the field, where Celia appealed to him to set the boys to run races, and reproached him for having been beguiled from his duty by her idle brother, with blithe unconsciousness of any dark background to the children's merriment.

He was shaking off his own grave thoughts, in the effort of obeying her behests, when presently a dog-cart came up the drive which circled the Home Close. It could hardly be the doctor's carriage yet, he thought, and it was not. It was Frank Allardyce and Caryl who got out, and, sending the groom on up to the Hall, came to see what was going on. Their campaign had apparently been successful, for Frank was in high spirits; and so was the candidate, in his much quieter way.

Douglas drew his brother aside for an instant, glancing to where Frank was romping with some of the tiniest children and swinging them to his shoulder.

"I think young Mr. Allardyce ought to know that his father has been very ill this evening," he said in an undertone. "He is better now, I hope; he is up at the house; but he was pretty bad, and Mr. Hamerton has sent for the doctor."

Caryl's face clouded with the look of one who hears grave but not unexpected news.

"Thanks. I'll tell Frank," he answered in the same tone. "I am sorry to hear it. Perhaps I ought to have stopped all this electioneering excitement for him days ago; but he seemed to enjoy it. I'll take Frank up to the house, and we'll hear what the doctor says."

He seemed to hesitate a moment, however, and when he walked away it was not to seek Frank Allardyce, but Celia, who was carefully unpacking paper balloons, with a circle of admiring urchins watching her.

Apparently he was trying to get her to accept a gift of candies for the children, or to accept his help in some way. Douglas could hear her say:

"I can't promise. Please go away and send your brother here; it is quite time these balloons were sent up."

Douglas was too near at hand to need sending; and as he obeyed his lady's directions, and their fingers met over the difficult task of persuading the crazy diaphanous things to become inflated instead of setting themselves on fire, he wondered whether it was a good sign or a bad one that she appealed to him and ordered him about, and so kept him near her while sending Caryl away.

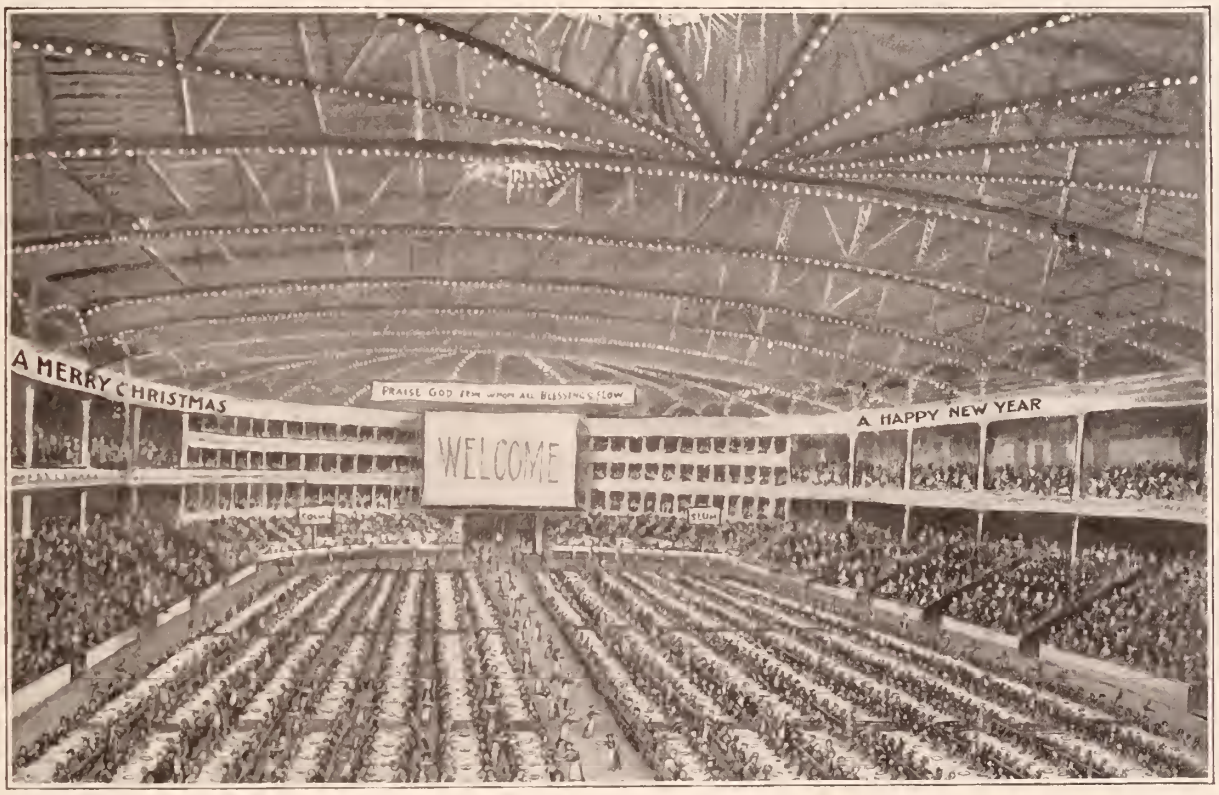
HOW THE MONEY WAS RAISED

The Great Salvation Army Dinner

Twenty-four Thousand Needy Poor Fed—The "Hunger Frieze"—Dish-Washing and Gospel Songs

MADISON SQUARE GARDEN

MANY events notable in the history of New York City have occurred in Madison Square Garden, the largest building in America devoted almost wholly to entertainment. The great amphitheatre is the home of the annual horse show, the opening social function of the year, sacred to New York's "Four Hundred," and its millionaires, their fine-stepping horses, their laces and their diamonds; it is the home of the annual French Ball; of the Circus; of the thousand-and-one things that go to make up the gay and complex life of a great city; and in it, political meetings affecting the destiny of our whole country have been held. But the greatest event that ever occurred there—an event that will go down in history as one of the widest-reaching religious and social significance—was the mammoth Salvation Army Christmas Dinner, Dec. 25, 1899, when 5,000 men, women and children of the city's poor—the maimed, the halt, the blind and the ragged—sat down to tables stretching the length of the great arena, and ate their fill of all good things. In the boxes and lower gallery, looking down upon them, their eyes glistening in sympathy, were thousands of ladies and gentlemen, in silk and broadcloth, who in some way had doubtless contributed to the feast. For weeks past as they had gone about their Christmas shopping, they had seen, at this or that corner, a Salvation Army soldier in uniform, standing guard over an iron pot hanging from a tripod under the legend, "Keep the Pot Boiling," and they had cast in coins. Well-known preachers and leading reformers and philanthropic workers came by invitation to see a sight that warmed their hearts—the feeding of a destitute and hungry multitude. Among these were Countess Schimmelmann, Rev. Dr. Wilson, Rev. Dr. Radcliffe, Gen. James R. O'Beirne; and Dr. Louis Klopsch, just from the Christmas Tree at the Bowery Mission.



THE FEAST OF THE POOR IN THE GARDEN AMPHITHEATRE

The story of this day's wonders in Madison Square Garden had begun long before the feast. For a week the kitchens had been in possession of from ten to thirty Salvation Army cooks, busily engaged in roasting and boiling and baking. Through the night of the 24th, 300 soldiers worked lustily packing some 4,000 baskets of uncooked dinners for as many families. Then, too, the long tables were to be set forth with snowy cloths, stands of celery, and gay ornaments. Early in the morning, Commander and Consul Booth-Tucker entered, giving oversight and lending helping hands. As the Army folks clattered knives and dishes about, they sang many cheerful Gospel songs.

Before eleven o'clock, the hour set for distribution, applicants for baskets were gathering by hundreds, and Captain Price and a squad of forty policemen formed them into a long line, four abreast. The helmeted knights were kind and cheery. The crowd was patient and good-natured; it was made up of the worthy poor whose cases were well known to the Army or to the various charitable organizations recommending them. It was a thinly-clad, hungry-looking host: a palsied man of eighty leaning on a cane; an aged blind woman led by a little girl; women with babies in their arms and children at their heels; the old, the young, decent poverty and undisguised rags and tatters helped to make up that long line of misery and want. By far the greater number were women. When the Fourth avenue door opened at eleven o'clock, the line numbered some 3,000. As they entered, an assembly of adjutants and captains, stood ready to give baskets in exchange for tickets. Consul Booth-Tucker herself was at the head of the company, wishing everybody "Merry Christmas! God bless you!" Every basket contained a dinner for five persons—a goodly fowl, can of condensed soup, five pounds of potatoes, other vegetables, two pounds of plum pudding and five bananas or oranges. The recipients took their gifts with words, smiles and often tears of thankfulness. Some were too old and infirm to carry so heavy a load, and for these Army lassies were detailed as escorts home. About two o'clock, all the baskets were given out; doors were closed, and preparations for the evening feast resumed. Outside, hungry hordes were gathering anew; the wind was cutting, and few were more than scantily clad: so, before the opening hour of 5.30 P. M., they were invited in and to the seats in the topmost gallery, where they sat silent and patient, watching the soldiers making ready in the arena their bountiful repast. Between them and the floor were the gallery and boxes where the prosperous guests were sitting; from this region came the murmurous sound of well-bred speech: now and then a ripple of laughter; and at last—a sob! A woman, looking up at the hungry gallery above had burst into uncontrollable tears. "The Hunger Frieze" of Madison Square Garden, 1899, the metropolitan press has with tragic and poetic aptness termed that upper gallery of the homeless and the starving.

When the first detachment of 2,200 had been conducted to their seats in the arena, trumpet calls for silence came from the four corners of the Garden; the orchestra ceased its merry march; Commander Booth-Tucker, from a platform, asked everyone present to join in singing the doxology; and Salvation Army men and women, the rich in the boxes and lower gallery, the helmeted policemen, the poor at the tables, the black and the white, the righteous and the sinful, the honest unfortunate, the ex-convict just from prison; perhaps, alas, the thief soon to find his way there, the old man and the little child—fully 10,000 voices—sang as with one accord: "Praise God from whom all blessing flow!"

Then the feast began. There were plates, knives, forks, spoons and even paper napkins for the diners. Busy red-coated soldiers and pretty uniformed Army lassies ran hither and thither with joyful alacrity, helping everybody to roast turkey, cranberry sauce, celery, potatoes, and various other vegetables; for dessert there was plum pudding, fruit, and coffee. Everything was first-class, the food being the best that money could buy, or the great-hearted charity of metropolitan merchants supply. Men ate hungrily, and asked for second and third portions and got what they asked for, none being denied. Many had made pathetic attempts to look neat and trim; some had plainly seen better days; others were unwashed and unshorn; all seemed grateful and appreciative.

When the first 2,200 had finished, their places were taken by a second detachment; after these, over 300 more were fed. Still the hungry host kept coming, and Salvation Army scouts, armed with baskets and money, skirmished the neighborhood for all available supplies; but in spite of their valiant efforts, many had to be turned empty away. The feast over, the tired Salvation Army soldiers began washing dishes, and setting things to rights, keeping time to their work with joyous hymns.

The Commander's parting address, delivered just after the dinner, was a fitting conclusion to the marvelous feast. He said:

In the name of the citizens of New York, I wish you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year. Whatever your circumstances, your nationality or your religion, we wish you good luck in the name of the Lord. So far as our Christmas efforts are concerned, I wish to give thanks to a generous public and a loyal press, and I am glad to report a victory. We started to feed twenty thousand and we have fed more than twenty-four thousand. It is the largest affair of the kind ever attempted.

No continental city—not even London—has ever had anything approaching this in magnitude. It means the dawning of a new era, the bridging of the gulf between the rich and the poor. From our hearts we thank the people of the city. God bless them all!

. . India's . . Piteous Appeal

Urgent Need of Immediate Succor to Avert an Appaling Calamity

SO generous was the response of our readers to the appeal issued in these columns two years ago, for funds to feed the starving people of India, that the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has felt reluctant to plead again for the same people. It seemed as if America had done enough for India. But it is impossible to turn a deaf ear to the piteous appeals that every mail brings. It is by no fault of their own that these people are bowed under a visitation following closely on the heels of the former calamity. Their need is as great now as then, and the same motive that prompted succor then should impel the follower of Christ to send relief now. It is impossible to incur the responsibility of keeping silence in view of the reports of suffering and the earnest prayers for help that come from the missionaries. The facts must be told and we must leave the matter in the hands of our readers. It is for them to say whether these poor starving women and children shall live or die; whether the missionaries must tell the poor hungry creatures that they have no funds wherewith to save them alive, or shall say to them: 'The followers of our Lord in America love him so well that they bid us feed you in his name, that you may know how compassionate he is and may accept him as your Saviour."

FAMINE BOYS IN THE SCHOOL AT SIRUR

Following is a letter from Rev. J. E. Abbott, the well-known missionary of the American Board in Bombay, who is now on a visit to this country. He is an acknowledged authority on Indian affairs, having lived in that country from boyhood and for eighteen years has been a missionary there:

"The cable report issued on Dec. 27 by Lord Curzon, the Viceroy of India, is to the effect that two and a half million people, were receiving relief. This shows the alarming proportions the famine is assuming. The details of the suffering and its sore pressure are to be found in the Indian papers, private letters, and cables of missionaries pleading for help. The scenes of 1897 are being repeated. No rain, and both the crops of the year have failed. The famine area is 350,000 square miles, and its population 30,000,000. The greater proportion of these are farmers, petty manufacturers, day laborers, and the wild tribes of the hills and plains. No rain means no food, for their resources are most limited, and with their fields barren, and no work it means actual death by lingering starvation unless help comes to relieve them.

"At such times of suffering, the pressure on missionaries becomes immense. In despair, the hungry crowd surrounds his house. Their emaciated bodies speak to the missionary louder than their words. In the famine of 1897, missionaries had, day by day and month by month, hundreds of such at their doors, whom if they could relieve, it was a benediction in itself; if they could not, it was a burden too heavy to bear. The same pressure is already again being felt, and pleading letters and cablegrams are being addressed to the generous hearted in this land to make it possible to relieve the suffering so present before them.

"Missionaries have a responsibility not only to suffering in general, but a special one to the Christian population. Natives, in becoming Christian, cut themselves off from the help that Hindu gives Hindu. As a Hindu, his neighbor better off might have helped him; but now, if starvation stares him in the face, it is to his fellow-Christians or to missionaries that he can alone turn. Here, then, is a responsibility that the Christians of America must feel, to help their brethren in Christ when in such dire distress, otherwise 'I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat' will be our condemnation from him who is the Judge of all.

"In the famine area there must be at least a hundred thousand Protestant Christians, and generally in the ranks of those that first feel the pinch of want. To these brethren we owe relief, and surely an appeal to Christian hearts in their behalf cannot be in vain.

"Those of us who had to do with the famine of 1897 acknowledge with great thankfulness the great assistance rendered by the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. There is not the slightest doubt that the help then rendered saved thousands of lives.

They gave then because their hearts were touched, but they could not have realized in full the missionary's joy to have in his possession the means with which daily to feed the companies of from a hundred to five hundred emaciated men, women and children, that cried at his door for help, or the joy of rescuing abandoned children from their slow and painful death. Surely the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, whose aid blessed so many two years ago, will help again in the name of Christ and suffering humanity.

"Many an affecting story is told which cannot fail to excite sympathy. In the Ahmednagar district, Dr. R. A. Hume writes that he knows from personal observation and inquiry, that thousands have been reduced to living on the fruit of the cactus plant. In Central India parents are already offering their children for sale. Cattle are dying by the thousands through lack of food and water, for it is a famine of water as well as food. At a meeting of the citizens of Bombay to raise a famine fund, the Governor of Bombay told the following story he had heard from one of his officials: Three women of the better class were discovered at a relief camp. In reply to questions the older woman said: 'All, all is gone. My husband, and the husbands of these two girls, went away with the cattle to find water and pasture with forty-seven buffaloes and 115 cattle of various sorts. Four days ago my husband returned footsore and ill. All the cattle were dead; my two sons were dead, and in two days my husband died; my all, my all is gone.'

"My own experiences in the famine of 1897 were not where its most terrible manifestations were visible, but I saw sufficient of its dark side, of the general gloom and anxiety, the pinching want of the masses, the emaciated bodies of thousands, the wandering of men and women in search of food, too feeble to be able to talk; the living skeletons, the little children whose arms and legs were mere sticks to support a trunk, swollen by their ravenous eating of indigestible food and drinking of water to stifle their hunger—enough I saw to make me realize the horrors; and the pictures that return to my mind move me to add my own plea to those which every mail is now bringing from India for money to help in feeding the hungry, and relieving the suffering that has fallen so heavily on that sad land. And the time to help is now, ere men and women are weakened beyond the power of our gifts to rescue them, or have fallen into blank despair."

A number of contributions have already been received from our readers, a list of which will appear next week in these columns. Money will be cabled to the Interdenominational Committee in Bombay.

The Fear of Humbug

Prevents Many People from Trying a Good Medicine

Stomach troubles are so common and in most cases so obstinate to cure that people are apt to look with suspicion on any remedy claiming to be a radical, permanent cure for dyspepsia and indigestion. Many such pride themselves on their acuteness in never being humbugged, especially in medicines.

This fear of being humbugged can be carried too far, so far, in fact, that many people suffer for years with weak digestion rather than risk a little time and money in faithfully testing the claims made of a preparation so reliable and universally used as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Now Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are vastly different in one important respect from ordinary proprietary medicines for the reason that they are not a secret patent medicine, no secret is made of their ingredients, but analysis shows them to contain the natural digestive ferments, pure aseptic pepsin, the digestive acids, Golden Seal, bismuth, hydrastis and nux. They are not cathartic, neither do they act powerfully on any organ, but they cure indigestion on the common sense plan of digesting the food eaten thoroughly before it has time to ferment, sour and cause the mischief. This is the only secret of their success.

Cathartic pills never have and never can cure indigestion and stomach troubles because they act only on the bowels, whereas the whole trouble is really in the stomach.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets taken after meals digests the food. That is all there is to it. Food not digested or half-digested is poison as it creates gas, acidity, headaches, palpitation of the heart, loss of flesh and appetite and many other troubles which are often called by some other name.

They are sold by druggists everywhere at 50 cents per package. Address F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., for little book on stomach diseases, sent free.

Growing Children

When children are growing they require an excessive amount of food, not only to supply the waste due to their active habits, but to supply constructive material to their growing frames. Cereal foods are among those necessary to the best growth and wheat is the best of the cereals.

CREAM OF WHEAT is the most nutritious of the wheat food preparation, as it is free from the indigestible husk, contains only a little starch, which is the poorest of foods, and retains all the really nutrient elements.

.. ONE BY ONE ..

One of Miss Fannie Crosby's Latest Hymns

Written by the aged poetess on hearing of the death of her friend, Rev. Robert Lowry, D.D.

FROM the ranks our friends are drop-
One by one, they pass away; [ping:
Soldiers brave who fought beside us
Many a long and weary day.
But their warfare is accomplished
And their life-work now is done:
At the river—peaceful river—
They are gathering—one by one!

They have reached the land of promise.
With the faithful gone before;
Safe within the Golden City
They shall dwell for evermore.
Through the Saviour they have conquered
And their life-work now is done:
At the river—tranquil river—
They are gathering—one by one!

From the ranks our friends are dropping,
Yet to memory they are dear;
Still in spirit we behold them.
And in dreams they hover near.
We shall meet them in the morning,
When our work on earth is done,
At the river—blessed river—
We shall gather—one by one!

Rural Postal Service

RURAL free delivery has already demonstrated itself one of the most successful features of our postal service. In some places it pays, in others almost maintains itself; and in a case or two receipts show a balance over expenditures, as at Westchester, Pa., where two fourth-class post offices ceased to exist as the result of the new competition, and the excess of revenue over the cost of operation was $593 in ten months. Forty States and one Territory have rural free delivery, radiating from some 383 distributing points; and numberless other districts from the Lakes to the Gulf are anticipating similar advantages. The more important results of the service as set forth in Assistant Postmaster-General Heath's annual report are: Increased postal receipts; more letters written and received; enhancement of value of farm lands; more newspapers and magazines subscribed for; general improvement of condition of roads; better prices for farm products, producers being brought into daily touch with the state of the markets; and—most important of all—the educational benefits conferred by relieving the monotony of farm-life through ready access to wholesome literature, and the keeping of farmers and their families fully informed as to the stirring events of the day.

American Committee Revision of the New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This is the version of the International Committee of Revision, set forth A.D. 1881, with the readings and renderings preferred by the American New Testament Co. edited by Roswell D. Hitchcock, D.D., late President of Union Theological Seminary, New York. In preparing the Revised Edition of the Bible, the Anglican company of twenty-five, and the American company of thirteen worked together more than three thousand miles apart. Most of the changes proposed by the former company were concurred in by the latter. And yet, after all their mutual concessions there remained a considerable number of rejected American suggestions, a list of which is appended to the volume issued from the University Presses of Oxford and Cambridge. These suggestions are in this volume incorporated in the text, and the Anglican forms are presented in an appendix, so that this book presents the Revised New Testament in a two-fold form—Anglican and American. Pp. 466. Publishers, Fords, Howard & Hulburt, New York City.

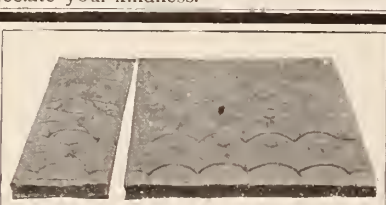
NEW HOME RUPTURE CURE

Remarkable Method that Heals Any Rupture Without Pain or Danger

No Operation or Detention From Work —Is Cheap, Safe and Sure.

Dr. W. S. Rice has backed up with convincing facts his statement that rupture can be cured at the patients' home without pain, danger operation or detention from work. He has invented a cheap and reliable method that has met with marvelous success and thousands of people ruptured for years have been permanently cured. It cured R. M. Wilsie, of Brandon, Wis., who had been ruptured 20 years. Mrs. M. E. Smith, Rockingham, Vt., was badly ruptured and cured herself by Dr. Rice's method. Wm. Bigford, Bishop Mills, Ont., tried various trusses with no success and finally cured himself by the Rice plan. Jacob Lindner, Drums, Pa., owes his cure to Dr. Rice. G. Nilson, Sogn, Minn., has a double rupture and calls Dr. Rice's method a God-send.

Several thousand cases are reported cured by this remarkable method and as it is very low in price, easily used, adapted to either sex, adults or children, every ruptured person should at once investigate it. Write to Dr. W. S. Rice, 392-D, Main St., Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a full description, so you can cure yourself in a few weeks, long before the heavy work of the springtime begins. Do not fail to write to-day and if you know of others afflicted, send their names for this wonderfully valuable information. They will appreciate your kindness.



"LUXURIOUS" MATTRESSES

A good hair mattress costs quite a bit of money. Many so-called "hair?" mattresses are sold at lower prices than our goods, but these low-priced goods often contain sweepings, short hair, or substitutes for hair, and will not give the service that really good hair will. Our mattresses are not made to compete with these cheap lines. They are made for those who want the very best and who are willing to pay the lowest price at which the best can be sold.

Our prices range from $15.00 to $39.60.

Our best grade is made of super extra white or best black English drawings the finest that money can buy.

For a covering, instead of the ordinary striped ticking, we use a beautiful Gobelin Art ticking —more expensive, of course, but it helps to make our mattresses better.

We are perfectly willing that our mattresses should be opened, and if the hair does not compare with sample sent, the price paid will be refunded.

Send us ten cents in stamps and let us know about how much you wish to pay for a mattress, and we will send samples of hair. We will also send samples of ticking, color illustrations, prices and our booklet entitled "Beds of Quality," which tells about good mattresses and "others."

∴ "Send Me" ∴

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Jan. 21. Isa. 6: 1-10

WARMTH, light, good cheer, merriment and happy faces under a hospitable roof, in the Christmas holidays. Children running to and fro; gaily dressed maidens gracefully walking hither and thither, laughing merrily, as one or another youth, returned from college or from business in the city, meets them and gives them glad greeting. Outside, a howling storm, wind and rain and hail and darkness. Some miles away over a rough country road is a family to whom a warm welcome would be given if they could be brought. But they have no vehicle, they do not know the way, and do not know that they would be welcome even if they came. Who will go and carry an invitation to them? Who will give up his enjoyment and comfort and go out through the rain and the storm to them and bring them to share in the happiness? How many would say, "Send me?" What shall we say of the young man who volunteers? He will be one who loves the family; he should be one who knows the road; he will be one who delights to be of service to the hospitable host; and he should be one who carries credentials.

The strength of the missionary cause at the beginning consisted in the fact that the men who contended that the Gospel ought to be preached to the heathen, were men who were willing and anxious to go themselves and preach it. If they had simply proposed resolutions, or proved that it was a duty to evangelize the heathen, or merely said that some one ought to go, we should have heard little of foreign missions. It was the intense earnestness, the manifest sincerity, the noble self-sacrifice of the early missionaries that gave the cause its power. When a man says, "Send me," we know that he believes in the message, he loves the people to whom he wants to go and he is thinking of their welfare more than of his own comfort. There were at the outset sufficient difficulties and disasters to test the heroism of the volunteers. When John Williams died under the savages' clubs at Erromanga, and when fierce persecution broke out in Thaiti, Madagascar, and other lands, the missionaries knew that their work had its physical dangers, as well as its spiritual obstacles. Then, when the climate began to seize victims, the courage of the volunteers was put to a new test. But there was no quailing, no drawing back. When one brave man fell at his post, killed by those whom he went to save, or was laid low by African fever, or Asiatic plague, another knowing all the danger, promptly stepped forward with the request, "Send me." The "love that constraineth" was still operating, and the church found she had heroes in her ranks.

The need now is not so much for men, as for money. There are volunteers in abundance, praying, "Send me;" but the missionary societies cannot send them. The fields are open; opportunities of preaching the Gospel to those who have never heard it, are occurring continually, men are here willing to go; but the means to send them are lacking. The demand for self-sacrifice has taken a new form. How many are ready to deny themselves comforts and luxuries, that the volunteers may be sent? The dollar, hardly earned, laid aside for some special purpose, cries from the Christian's pocket, "Send me." That dollar may be an effective preacher. It may aid in sending to some neglected field a consecrated worker, who will win souls for Christ. In these days of great combinations, the work of winning all heathendom for Christ ought to be planned with intelligence. The work needs to be done, and whatever is most needed should be supplied. In a great crisis in a military campaign, the demands of an army are supplied at any cost. A government would be criminal that sent out an army and did not take care that it was supplied with war material. Is the Church less criminal that does not furnish the means for carrying on the campaign for Christ and righteousness?

PSALMS, XCI.—XCIV. Security of believers. Folly of atheists and oppressors.

PSALM XCI.

HE that dwelleth[a] in the secret place of the Most High, shall [β] abide under the shadow[c] of the Almighty.

2 I will say of the LORD, He is my refuge, and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust.

3 Surely[d] he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence.

4 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler.

5 Thou[h] shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day;

6 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday.

7 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.

8 Only[k] with thine eyes shalt thou behold, and see the reward of the wicked.

9 Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation, 10 There[s] shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.

11 For[v] he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.

12 They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.

13 Thou[x] shalt tread upon the lion and [κ] adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet.

14 Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.

15 He[z] shall call upon me, and I will answer him: [λ] I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him.

16 With [μ] long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation.

PSALM XCII.

A Psalm or Song for the Sabbath day.

IT[a] is a good thing to give thanks unto the LORD, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High:

2 To shew forth thy lovingkindness in the morning,[c] and thy faithfulness [ν] every night,

3 Upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the psaltery; [ξ] upon the harp with [o] a solemn sound.

4 For thou, LORD, hast made me glad through thy work; I will triumph in the works of thy hands.

5 O LORD, how great are thy works! and thy thoughts[d] are very deep.

6 A brutish man knoweth not; neither doth a fool understand this.

7 When[e] the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever:

8 But thou, LORD, art most high for evermore.

9 For, lo, thine enemies, O LORD, for, lo, thine enemies shall perish; all[g] the workers of iniquity shall be scattered.

10 But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of an unicorn: I shall be anointed[i] with fresh oil.

11 Mine eye also shall see my desire on mine enemies; and mine ears shall hear my desire of the wicked that rise up against me.

12 The righteous[o] shall flourish like the palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.

13 Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God.

14 They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and [γ] flourishing;

15 To shew that the LORD is upright: he is my rock,[s] and there is no unrighteousness[t] in him.

PSALM XCIII.

THE[a] LORD reigneth; he is clothed with majesty; the LORD is clothed with strength, wherewith he hath girded himself: the world also is established, that it cannot be moved.

2 Thy throne[l] is established [δ] of old: thou art from everlasting.

3 The floods have lifted up, O LORD, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves.

4 The[l] LORD on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea.

5 Thy testimonies are very sure: holiness[m] becometh thine house, O LORD, [ζ] for ever.

PSALM XCIV.

O LORD [η] God, to whom[p] vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, [θ] shew thyself.

2 Lift up thyself, thou judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud.

3 LORD, how long[r] shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?

4 How long shall they utter and speak hard[s] things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves?

5 They break in pieces thy people, O LORD, and afflict thine heritage.

6 They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless.

7 Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.

8 Understand,[u] ye brutish among the people; and, ye fools, when will ye be wise?

9 He[v] that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?

10 He that chastiseth the heathen,[x] shall not he correct? he[b] that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?

11 The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are[c] vanity.

12 Blessed[d] is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD, and teachest him out of thy law;

13 That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked.

14 For[f] the LORD will not cast off his people, neither will he forsake his inheritance.

15 But judgment shall return unto righteousness: and all the upright in heart [ρ] shall follow it.

16 Who will rise up for me against the evildoers? or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity?

17 Unless[i] the LORD had been my help, my soul had[σ] almost dwelt in silence.

18 When I said, My foot[k] slippeth; thy mercy, O LORD, held me up.

19 In the multitude of my thoughts within me thy comforts[τ] delight my soul.

20 Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which[u] frameth mischief by a law?

MR. MOODY'S MOST FAMOUS TEXT

From this page of Mr. Moody's Bible, containing the Ninety-first Psalm, with his own annotations, he preached his famous "Life and Death" sermon, and it was also from this same page that he spoke to the passengers of the steamship Spree in November, 1892, when it was thought the ship would founder at sea.

Questions of the Week

1. Is godliness profitable in this life? That is, are the temporal affairs of a righteous man prospered through his religion?

Since God's Word declares that godliness is profitable for the life that now is, it must affect favorably a man's temporal affairs. The necessities of life are promised to those who seek first the kingdom of God. He who contemplates being godly for the sake of gain does not know what true godliness is (see I. Tim. 6:5; also Acts 8:19). Under the old covenant, godliness in the nation assured national prosperity. Better blessings are promised under the New Testament dispensation. Temporal prosperity is, however, still a rational sequence of godliness. The higher the tone of the mental and moral qualities the better the business qualifications. Godliness demands industry, economy, honesty, courtesy, patience, hope—all most useful in temporal affairs. "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working" (James 5:16), and he is permitted to pray for prosperity in temporal affairs. We are encouraged to bring everything, by prayer, unto God (Phil. 4:6).

2. Which of America's poets, living or dead, is entitled to be considered her leading bard?

Longfellow. No other American writer has been able to carry the reader along with the characters of a narrative as has this poet. He was a master of word-painting, and carried this art to the highest pitch; while his pathos is pure, natural, and deeply affecting. His poems appeal to the heart and to all the finer attributes of mankind. Who, having read "Evangeline," has failed to see in his mind's eye the forms and features of the characters delineated; the changing seasons; even the very colors of earth and trees and sky in the different lands; or has not felt the joys and sorrows in the changing fortunes of the heroine as though they were his own? His poems are grand in conception, elevating in their influence, and marvelous in rhetorical handling and imagery; while through all runs a silver thread of earnest thought, which teaches the lesson of honor, love, and charity.

3. Which is the oldest Protestant church organization in the United States still in existence?

The Reformed Protestant Dutch Church, organized in New York City in 1628, appears to be the first Protestant Church organized in the United States, and still in existence without a break in its history. Correspondents claim this honor for certain Congregational and Episcopal churches, but have not substantiated their claims. Some further interesting facts on early church organizations may yet appear in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

4. How can a wife best influence an unbelievi husband to attend church with her?

She must be fully devoted to the Churc We can only interest others in what we ou selves are truly interested. Her religion mu be a real treasure in her life. It must be se that her religion and church attendance i part to her some rare sweetness and beau and charm and victorious power that rend her life and portion enviable. Said a devot of worldly fashion and pleasure to a lac whose religious life shone in her very fac "If Jesus Christ made your face like that, want to believe in him." Again, the wife mu love her husband. Only the hand of love c turn around and lead the disobedient sou He must have unanswerable proof of her lo for him. She must love him too well to ass ciate with him in what her conscience forbid and she must love him so well as to prove h willingness to give her life for him. Again, t wife must have the heart of her husband. 5. In view of the enormous natural increase the heathen population, does the number accessions to Christianity warrant our clain ing that the cause of Christ is making pro ress in heathen countries?

Yes. The number of professing Christian among the heathen is not a fair test. Man who believe, are doubtless more deterred froi confessing Christ by fear of ridicule or loss business, friends or caste, than in Christia lands. History repeats itself. The numeric increase in open Christians was small in apo tolic times until persecution ceased and Co stantine adopted Christianity as a State r ligion. In the meantime, it had penetrate every rank of society. To-day, in addition t the missionary, we have a Christian civiliz tion and culture which by the telegraph an railroad, the teacher, college professor, judg executive, and police official, and, even by th soldier, is moulding and ripening heathendor for the time when a nation shall be born in day. 6. What American woman, not now living, i entitled, by reason of service rendered to th public, to be considered the most illustriou woman of the United States?

Frances E. Willard. In her personal philan thropic work of various kinds, she addresse more people from platforms and pulpits, an won more men from intemperance, an aroused more cultivated women to follow he own example than any woman our countr has produced. She founded and develope the work of the Woman's Christian Temper ance Union with its far-reaching influence Nor must her White Cross work in the interes of social purity be forgotten.

7. Should a Christian church take into its fellowship a person who has not been converte or who has not publicly confessed Christ? I there any warrant, Scriptural or otherwise, for such a course?

No church should knowingly receive an un converted person into membership. In many denominations the children of Christian par ents are, upon baptism, regarded as members of the church, but that is membership in a limited sense, as when arriving at years of dis cretion, personal confession of faith is neces sary to admit them to the privileges of full membership.

8. When was the British nation first given the name of John Bull?

John Bull, the familiar name given to the English people, was first generally used in literature in 1712 by John Arbuthnot, a Scottish physician, in his satire, "The History of John Bull." In the same satire the French are designated as "Louis Baboon," the Dutch as "Nicholas Frog," etc. "The History of John Bull" was designed to ridicule the Duke of Marlborough.

9. Should a Christian marry an unconverted person?

Paul tells the Corinthians that they should not be unequally yoked with unbelievers. It will be said that the term is not applicable to persons in Christian lands who, while not personally accepting and confessing Christ, still admit the claims of Christianity. Paul tells the Corinthians that a widow is permitted to marry again, but adds the significant words "only in the Lord." A Christian who marries a person who is not converted cannot be said to marry "in the Lord." Such a one risks loss of spirituality, and in the event of offspring, saddles upon the children at least one unbelieving parent.

10. What measure passed by our national Legislature has done most to advance the interests of the people of the United States?

The Homestead Law, passed May 20, 1862, securing to any citizen the right to enter upon 160 acres of unappropriated lands at $1.25 an acre, and after five years' actual residence to own it, has proved of immense benefit to the country. It stimulated the settlement of the West; has brought a fine foreign population to our country, and has done wonders in developing agriculture.

Evangelist Moody's Mantle

It Falls Upon His Eldest Son and Chosen Successor, W. R. Moody — His Great Life-Work to Go on—A Talk With the New Head of the Family

"I WANT you, Will, to carry on my work when I am gone." This was the last command of the great evangelist, Dwight L. Moody, as he lay on his death-bed at East Northfield. Time and again had he expressed this dearest wish, and next to the thought of Heaven itself, it was the one that lay nearest to his great heart.

Probably no man could begin a great life-work with better equipment than that which Will R. Moody, the eldest son of the great evangelist, brings to the duties before him. He was born in Chicago forty years ago and is a tall, broad-shouldered and ruggedly built man, with the strong Moody features well marked—the firm, yet kindly mouth, eyes that look straight at you when their owner speaks, and an abundance of brown hair. Educated and traveled, Will R. Moody in voice and gesture, gives evidence of the same resolute nature and deeply earnest, even ardent nature that were characteristic of the father. Ever since boyhood, he has been to a considerable extent his father's companion and close confidant; in recent years more so than ever.

Mr. Moody's Personal Wish

In conversation with the writer in the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Will R. Moody spoke most confidently of the future of the work founded by his late father. His father's plans and aspirations, he said, were his own, and he would endeavor to carry them out in every respect as Mr. Moody would have wished to do had he lived.

"For a number of years past," he said, "it has been a part of my duties to collect all the available and authoritative data in existence concerning the beginning, progress and development of my father's work. My intimate connection with the work in all its phases, both at home and abroad, has enabled me to do this as no other man could have done it. It was his personal desire, too, and frequently expressed, long before his last illness, that after he had passed away his son and no other should give to the world the story of his life and its outcome, and with this purpose in view he withheld nothing that would be of the slightest value to his chosen biographer. I have absolutely all my father's writings, letters and other documents, and have already begun to put them in shape; but the task will necessarily occupy time and is not one to be hurried hastily or issued in a crude and incomplete form. I can say now that it will be the only record of my father's life which the family authorizes, for the reason that it will be the only one that will contain any data of value. No scrap of correspondence nor any document has been permitted to pass into any other hands."

It is not proposed to make money for any of the family from the sale of the authorized biography of the great evangelist. All revenues from that source will go directly into the work for the support and extension of its various departments both at Northfield and Chicago.

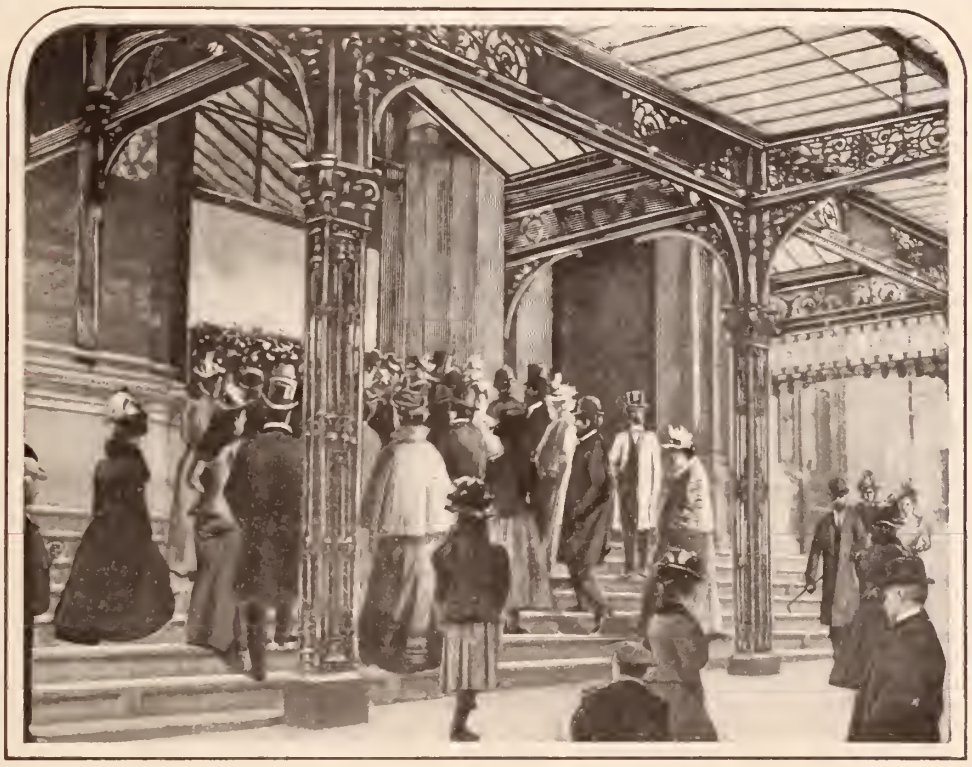
The New Head of the Family

Will R. Moody, the new head of the family, is a graduate of Yale. After leaving college he traveled with his father abroad, and for a time was in charge of the business affairs of the schools at Mount Hermon. He received biblical instruction from his father, and greatly assisted in the evangelical and school work. He inherits much of his father's fervor. About four years ago he married Miss Mary Whittle, daughter of Major Whittle, the evangelist. They have buried two children, Dwight L. Moody, Jr., and Irene. Both were very dear to the grandfather. It was of this little dead daughter of his son, that Mr. Moody, only a few hours before his death, said: "I have been within the gates: I have seen Irene." A few months ago, another child was born to them—a little daughter named Mary.

Paul Moody, the second son of the evangelist, is about twenty years of age and is studying at Yale. The only daughter is the wife of Mr. E. P. Fitt, who has been closely identified with the Northfield work for several years.

The Memorial Service

Moody Memorial services, held in many churches both at home and abroad, gave expression to the widespread feeling of bereavement caused by the death of the great evangelist. Probably no man's death, after a life wholly devoted to spiritual work, has ever been more universally regretted. The most notable memorial gathering ever held in this country took place in Carnegie Music Hall, New York City, on the afternoon of January 8.



CARNEGIE HALL, NEW YORK, WHERE THE MOODY MEMORIAL SERVICES WERE HELD

The vast audience was a thoroughly representative one; the rich and the poor, saint and sinner were there. Mr. Wm. E. Dodge, the well-known philanthropist, presided; Mr. Ira D. Sankey conducted the singing, and Mr. Victor E. Benke (the Bowery Mission organist), was the accompanist. The funeral march was played by G. Waring Stebbins, of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. About 300 ministers occupied the platform, which was reserved for clergymen, with the exception of a few prominent business men there to represent the secular appreciation of Mr. Moody's work.

Just before the meeting was formally opened, Mr. Sankey said: "We have still five minutes to spare, and it is suggested that we sing a few Gospel hymns." The first chosen was the familiar hymn:

My days are gliding swiftly by.

This was followed by a hymn that was very popular with Mr. Moody:

My Jesus, I love Thee,
I know Thou art mine.

At three o'clock Mr. W. E. Dodge took the chair and called the large audience to order. The services opened with the singing of the hymn.

In the Cross of Christ I Glory.

Rev. A. T. Pierson, D.D., read from the Scriptures texts appropriate to the solemn occasion.

Moody's Influence

Rev. J. Balcom Shaw offered the opening prayer. He thanked God for Moody's influence in the Church, for his enrichment of Christian life, and he petitioned for the continuance of his work.

Mr. Dodge at 3.20 began his address, and said, in substance:

In the history of the Church of Christ very few have touched so many hearts and influenced so many lives as Dwight L. Moody. If all those whom he has led to a better life could be gathered together, half a dozen halls like this could not hold them. There should be no touch of funeral gloom in this demonstration.

His early work was very simple and he had few opportunities for education. He possessed no gift of utterance. I remember one morning going into his poor little school of slum boys, across the river, in Chicago, and was impressed there with his manliness, simplicity and humor. There were two things to which he owed his marvelous success: Companionship with the Y. M. C. A. and study of the English Bible. He had the idea, in the beginning of his work, that if God wanted him to speak he would teach him what to say. A friend advised him to study the Bible and prepare himself better. He shut himself up with his Bible for a great while; and he got from the Bible an arsenal of argument, promise and warning which he used all his life with such magnificent power.

His simple directness was something wonderful. When I first met him in Chicago, we went to call on a wealthy and prominent man

At 3.43 P. M. the venerable Rev. Theo. L. Cuyler, D.D., one of Mr. Moody's oldest and dearest friends, was introduced and spoke briefly. He compared him with Abraham Lincoln. Called him and Lincoln the "typical Americans." Lincoln was the liberator of millions; and so also was Moody a spiritual liberator. He continued:

The Lord Chancellor of England has said of him: "He gives me a new conception of preaching." In his last sermon in this city before starting to Kansas City, he said: "When you read that Dwight L. Moody is dead, don't believe it. He is more alive than ever."

Mr. Robert Fulton Cutting, at 3.57 P.M., was introduced as a layman, giving testimony. He spoke about ten minutes, saying in part:

It is a good many years since I last saw Mr. Moody in his own house, and I have been a richer man for that experience. I never knew any man whose preaching touched me so. He was so perfectly frank and courageous. His one doctrine was God's love for the world. The only heretic he knew was an unconverted man.

Mr. Moody's Zeal for Souls

Rev. David G. Burrell, D.D., also paid an eloquent tribute to the great revivalist. He said, among other things:

The inspiration of his life was: "This one thing I do." I met Mr. Moody as a Bible student thirty-one years ago. My room was up in old Farwell Hall; Mr. Moody's rooms were just below. A fire occurred early in the morning; the hall burned slowly. In the street at noon I saw Mr. Moody in front of the burning building, coatless, hatless, and a bundle in his hand. He said: "Take these and distribute them. They tell the people that our beautiful hall is burned up, and that our noonday meeting will be held in the Park Street Church."

At this point in the service a man seated behind THE CHRISTIAN HERALD representative, handed the writer this card, with the first two lines written in pencil:

I printed those handbills and gave them to Mr. Moody to distribute, and helped him.

JOHN DEAN

Y.M.C.A., 23d St., New York.

Hon. John Wanamaker telegraphed his regrets that, owing to sickness, he could not be present. Mr. Sankey then sang a solo, "Saved by Grace."

The chorus—by Mr. Sankey's request, "for the sake of old times"—was sung by the audience and repeated by the gallery on the last verse being reached. After the song, Mr. Sankey spoke briefly, telling of his arrival in Northfield after hearing of Mr. Moody's death.

I went to the chamber of death where he lay as though he were only asleep. I could hardly believe that my friend was gone, he looked so natural. While he and I have been journeying together, I have often seen him come into our room, throw himself on the lounge and drop to sleep in a moment. I have often wondered at his capacity for falling to sleep quickly. He would wake in a little while, refreshed and ready for work again. Looking down upon his quiet face I said, "Good-bye, dear Mr. Moody."

I saw at the funeral an old man, bowed on a staff, mourning for him. He said: "Oh, he was my friend—but then, he was everybody's friend." That is true. He was the friend of everybody in Northfield.

A Young Man's Tribute

Mr. John R. Mott, Secretary of the Students' Movement, said:

There is no class over whom Mr. Moody exerted a greater influence than over thinking young men and women—students of this and other countries. It was his work at Princeton in 1876-77 that led to the formation of the "Students' Movement" in this country and Canada, and which has extended to almost every country of the globe. Over twenty of these great intercollegiate gatherings are held for the training of young men and women in Christian work. Yale, Harvard, University of Virginia, Princeton, all enlisted in it. Its membership includes thousands of young men and women. Mr. Moody's work in evangelizing Oxford, Cambridge, University of Edinburgh was marvelous. Scholarly men came and were converted. Henry Drummond was first influenced by Moody.

Rev. A. C. Dixon spoke briefly. He said:

Mr. Moody was a miracle. I hope some of you millionaires will use your millions to perpetuate his schools. Pastors and evangelists should give prayers and work to this end.

Rev. J. M. Buckley, D.D., spoke of Mr. Moody's spotless reputation and of his rounded character.

He spoke eloquently of his masterfulness combined with modesty. Mr. Moody was great as he was good. He should not be forgotten; we should raise a memorial to him. He urged steps to carry on the work begun by Moody at Northfield for the perpetuation of his schools.

Among the audience were many ladies and gentlemen prominent in the religious, philanthropic, social and business life of New York and other cities, all sections of the Union finding representation, while the box list contained such names as John D. Rockefeller, Morris K. Jesup, Wm. J. Schoefflin, Louis Klopsch, R. C. Ogden, Russell Sage, James Yearance, and many others equally well known in philanthropic movements.

Wonders of the Eye

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Psalms 94: 9, ... } He that formed the eye, shall he not see?

THE imperial organ of the human system is the eye. All up and down the Bible God honors it, extols it, illustrates it, or arraigns it. Five hundred and thirty-four times is it mentioned in the Bible. Omnipresence—"the eyes of the Lord are in every place." Divine care—"as the apple of the eye." The clouds—"the eyelids of the morning." Irreverence—"the eye that mocketh at its father." Pride—"oh, how lofty are their eyes." Inattention—"the fool's eye in the ends of the earth." Divine inspection—"wheels full of eyes." Suddenness—"in the twinkling of an eye at the last trump." Olivetic sermon—"the light of the body is the eye." This morning's text: "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?"

The surgeons, the doctors, the anatomists and the physiologists understand much of the glories of the two great lights of the human face; but the vast multitudes go on from cradle to grave without any appreciation of the two great masterpieces of the Lord God Almighty. If God had lacked anything of infinite wisdom he would have failed in creating the human eye. We wander through the earth trying to see wonderful sights, but the most wonderful sight we ever see is not so wonderful as the instruments through which we see it.

It has been a strange thing to me for thirty years that some scientist did not go through the country with illustrated lecture on canvas thirty feet square, to startle and thrill and overwhelm Christendom with the marvels of the human eye. We want the eye taken from all its technicalities, and someone who shall lay aside all talk about the pterygomaxillary fissures, the sclerotica, and the chiasma of the optic nerve, and in plain, common parlance which you and I and everybody can understand, present the subject. We have learned men who have been telling us what our origin is and what we were. Oh, if some one should come forth from the dissecting-table and from the classroom of the university and take the platform, and asking the help of the Creator demonstrate the wonders of what we are. If I refer to the physiological facts suggested by the former part of my text, it is only to bring out in plainer way the theological lessons of the latter part of my text. "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?"

I suppose my text referred to the human eye since it excels all others in structure and adaptation. The eyes of fish and reptiles and moles and bats are very simple things because they have not much to do. There are insects with a hundred eyes, but the hundred eyes have less faculty than the two human eyes. The black beetle swimming the summer pond has two eyes under the water and two eyes above the water, but the four insectile are not equal to the two human. Man placed at the head of all living creatures must have supreme equipment, while the blind fish in the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky have only an undeveloped organ of sight, an apology for the eye, which if through some crevice of the mountain they should go into the sunlight might be developed into positive eyesight.

In the first chapter of Genesis we find that God without any consultation created the light, created the trees, created the fish, created the fowl, but when he was about to make man he called a convention of divinity, as though to imply that all the powers of Godhead were to be enlisted in the achievement. "Let us make man." Put a whole ton of emphasis on that word "us." "Let us make man." And if God called a convention of divinity to create man, I think the two great questions in that conference were how to create a soul and how to make an appropriate window for that emperor to look out of.

See how God honored the eye before he created it. He cried until chaos was irradiated with the utterance: "Let there be light"! In other words, before he introduced man into this temple of the world, he illumined it, prepared it for the eyesight. And so after the last human eye has been destroyed in the final demolition of the world, stars are to fall and the sun is to cease its shining, and the moon is to turn into blood. In other words, after the human eyes are no more to be profited by their shining, the chandeliers of heaven are to be turned out. God to educate and to bless and to help the human eye, set on the mantle of heaven two lamps—a gold lamp and a silver lamp—the one for the day and the other for the night.

To show how God honors the eye, look at the two halls built for the residence of the eyes. Seven bones making the wall for each eye, the seven bones curiously wrought together. Kingly palace of ivory is considered rich, but the halls for the residence of the human eyes are richer by so much as human bone is more sacred than elephantine tusk. See how God honored the eyes when he made a roof for them, so that the sweat of toil should not smart them, and the rain dashing against the forehead might not drip into them: the eyebrows not bending over the eye, but reaching to the right and to the left so that the rain and the sweat should be compelled to drop upon the cheek instead of falling into this divinely protected human eyesight.

See how God honored the eye in the fact presented by anatomists and physiologists that there are 800 contrivances in every eye. For window shutters, the eyelids opening and closing 30,000 times a day. The eyelashes so constructed that they have their selection as to what shall be admitted, saying to the dust, "stay out," and saying to the light, "come in." For inside curtain, the iris or pupil of the eye, according as the light is greater or less, contracting or dilating. The eye of the owl is blind in the daytime, the eyes of some creatures are blind at night, but the human eye so marvelously constructed it can see both by day and by night.

Many of the other creatures of God can move the eye only from side to side, but the human eye, so marvelously constructed, has one muscle to lift the eye and another muscle to lower the eye, and another muscle to roll it to the right, and another muscle to roll it to the left, and another muscle passing through a pulley to turn it round and round—an elaborate gearing of five muscles as perfect as God could make them.

There is also the retina gathering the rays of light and passing the visual impression along the optic nerve about the thickness of the lamp wick, passing the visual impression on to the sensorium and on into the soul. What a delicate lens, what an exquisite screen, what soft cushions, what wonderful chemistry of the human eye. The eye washed by a slow stream of moisture whether we sleep or wake, rolling imperceptibly over the pebble of the eye and emptying into a bone of the nostril, a contrivance so wonderful that it can see the sun ninety-five millions of miles away, and the point of a pin. Telescope and microscope in the same contrivance. The astronomer swings and moves this way and that, and adjusts and re-adjusts the telescope until he gets it to the right focus; the microscopist moves this way and that, and adjusts and readjusts the magnifying glass until it is prepared to do its work, but the human eye without a touch beholds the star and the smallest insect. The traveler along the Alps with one glance taking in Mont Blanc and the face of his watch to see whether he has time to climb it. Oh this wonderful camera obscura which you and I carry about with us, so from the top of Mount Washington we can take in New England, so at night we can sweep into our vision the constellations from horizon to horizon. So delicate, so semi-infinite, and yet the light coming ninety-five millions of miles at the rate of two hundred thousand miles a second, is obliged to halt at the gate of the eye, waiting until the portcullis be lifted. Something hurled ninety-five millions of miles and striking an instrument which has not the agitation of even winking under the power of the stroke.

There also, is the merciful arrangement of the tear gland by which the eye is washed and through which rolls the tide which brings the relief that comes in tears when some bereavement or great loss strikes us. The tear not an augmentation of sorrow, but the breaking up of the Arctic of frozen grief in the warm Gulf Stream of consolation. Incapacity to weep is madness or death. Thank God for the tear glands and that the crystal gates are so easily opened. Oh, the wonderful hydraulic apparatus of the human eye! Divinely constructed vision. Two lighthouses at the harbor of the immortal soul under the shining of which the world sails in and drops anchor.

What an anthem of praise to God is the human eye! The tongue is speechless and a clumsy instrument of expression as compared with it. Have you not seen the eye flash with indignation, or kindle with enthusiasm, or expand with devotion, or melt with sympathy, or stare with fright, or leer with villainy, or droop with sadness, or pale with envy, or fire with revenge, or twinkle with mirth, or beam with love? It is tragedy and comedy and pastoral and lyric in turn. Have you not seen its uplifted brow of surprise, or its frown of wrath, or its contraction of pain? If the eye say one thing and the lips say another thing, you believe the eye rather than the lips. The eyes of Archibald Alexander and Charles G. Finney were the mightiest part of their sermons. George Whitefield enthralled great assemblages with his eyes, though they were crippled with strabismus. Many a military chieftain has with a look hurled a regiment to victory or to death. Martin Luther turned his great eye on an assassin who came to take his life, and the villain fled. Under the glance of the human eye the tiger, with five times a man's strength, snarls back into the African jungle.

But those best appreciate the value of the eye who have lost it. The Emperor Adrian, by accident, put out the eye of his servant, and he said to his servant, "What shall I pay you in money, or in lands?—anything you ask me. I am so sorry I put your eye out." But the servant refused to put any financial estimate on the value of the eye, and when the emperor urged and urged again the matter, he said: "O Emperor, I want nothing but my lost eye." Alas for those for whom a thick and impenetrable veil is drawn across the face of the heavens and the face of one's own kindred. That was a pathetic scene when a blind man lighted a torch at night and was found passing along the highway, and some one said, "Why do you carry that torch when you can't see?" "Ah!" said he, "I can't see, but I carry this torch that others may see me and pity my helplessness and not run me down." Samson, the giant, with his eyes put out by the Philistines, is more helpless than the smallest dwarf with vision undamaged. All the sympathies of Christ were stirred when he saw Bartimeus with darkened retina, and the only salve he ever made that we read of was a mixture of dust and saliva, and a prayer with which he cured the eyes of a man blind from his nativity. The value of the eye shown as much by its catastrophe as by its healthful action. Ask the man who for twenty years has not seen the sun rise. Ask the man who for half a century has not seen the face of a friend. Ask in the hospital the victim of ophthalmia. Ask the man whose eyesight perished in a powder blast. Ask the Bartimeus who never met a Christ, or the man born blind who is to die blind. Ask him.

How it adds to John Milton's sublimity of character, when we find him at the call of duty sacrificing his eyesight. Through studying at late hours and trying all kinds of medicament to preserve his sight, he had for twelve years been coming toward blindness, and, after awhile, one eye was entirely gone. His physician warned him that if he continued reading and writing he would lose the other eye. But he kept on with his work, and said, after sitti in total darkness, "The choice lay befc me between dereliction of a supreme du and loss of eyesight: in such a case could not listen to the physician, not Æsculapius himself had spoken from l sanctuary; I could not but obey that i ward monitor, I know not what spoke me from heaven." Who of us would ha grace enough to sacrifice our eyes at t call of duty?

But, thank God, some have been e abled to see without very good eyes. Ge eral Havelock, the son of the more famo General Havelock, told me this concer ing his father. In India, while his fath and himself with the army were encampe one evening-time after a long marc General Havelock called up his soldie and addressed them, saying in words, near as I can recollect: "Soldiers! The are two or three hundred women, childr and men at Cawnpore at the mercy Nana Sahib and his butchers. Tho poor people may any hour be sacrifice How many of you will go with me for tl rescue of those women and children? know you are all worn out, and so am But all those who will march with me save those women and children hold your hand." Then Havelock said: " is almost dark, and my eyesight is ve poor and I cannot see your raised hand but I know they are all up. Forward Cawnpore!" That hero's eyes, thoug almost extinguished in the service of Gc and his country, could see across Indi and across the centuries. But let anybod who has one good eye be thankful, an all who have two good eyes be twice thankful. Take care of your eyes an thank God every morning when you ope them for capacity to see the light. I d not wonder at the behavior of a poor ma in France. He had been born blind, bu was a skilful groom in the stables.

A surgeon riding up one evening, gav his horses into the care of the blin groom. Late at night the traveling sur geon went to the stables and found th groom still at work upon the horses, an the grateful and sympathetic surgeon re solved in the morning to reward the blin groom with money. But in the night th surgeon bethought himself that perhaps h could give the groom something bette than money. In the morning he said to th blind groom, "Step out into the sunshine You are forty years of age. I could sure ly have cured your blindness if I ha seen you sooner, but come to Paris and will give you sight if you do not die unde the operation." Paying the poor man' way to Paris, the operation was success ful. For the first time the man saw hi wife and children, and having taken good look at them he turned and said "Let me look on my friend the surgeon who has opened all this beautiful world t me and shown me my loved ones." Wa not that glorious? Only those who hav been restored from utter blindness ca appreciate the omnipotent blessing o eyesight.

The Earl of Bridgewater, in his las will and testament, bequeathed $40,00 for essays to be written on the power an wisdom and goodness of God as mani fested in creation, and Sir Charles Bell the British surgeon, fresh from Corunn and Waterloo, where he had been tending the wounded and studying the formatio of the human body amid the amputating horrors of the battlefield, accepted the in vitation to write one of those Bridgewate treatises, and he wrote his book on th human hand—a book that will live as long as the world lives. To-day I have only hinted at the splendors, the glories, the wonders, the divine revelations, the apocalypses of the human eye, and I stagger back from the awful portals of the physiological miracle which must have taxed the ingenuity of a God, to cry out in your ears the words of my text: "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?" Shall Herschel not know as much as his telescope? Shall Fraunhofer not know as much as his spectroscope? Shall Swammerdam not know as much as his microscope? Shall Dr. Hooke not know as much as his micrometer? Shall the thing formed know more than its maker? "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?"

The recoil of this question is tremendous. We stand at the centre of a vast circumference of observation. No privacy. On us, eyes of cherubim, eyes of seraphim, eyes of archangel, eyes of God. We may not be able to see the inhabitants of her worlds, but perhaps they may be le to see us. We have not optical insuments strong enough to descry them;

rhaps they have optical instruments long enough to descry us. The mole nnot see the eagle mid-air, but the eagle rd-sky can see the mole mid-grass. We e able to see mountains and caverns of other world; but perhaps the inhabints of other worlds can see the towers our cities, the flash of our seas, the arching of our processions, the white bes of our weddings, the black scarfs our obsequies. It passes out from the ess into the positive, when we are told the Bible that the inhabitants of other orlds do come to this. Are they not all inistering spirits sent forth to minister those who shall be heirs of salvation?

But human inspection and angelic in-section and stellar inspection and lunar spection and solar inspection are tame compared with the thought of divine spection. "You converted me twenty ars ago," said a colored man to my ther. "How so?" said my father.
"wenty years ago," said the other, "in e old schoolhouse prayer-meeting at ound Brook, you said in your prayer,
'hou God seest me,' and I had no peace der the eye of God until I became a hristian." Hear it: "The eyes of the rd are in every place." "His eyelids the children of men." "His eyes were a flame of fire." "I will guide thee th mine eye." Oh, the eye of God, so ll of pity, so full of power, so full of e, so full of indignation, so full compassion, so full of mercy.
ow it peers through the dark-ss! How it outshines the day!
ow it glares upon the offender!
ow it beams on the penitent ul! Talk about the human eye being indescribably wonderful how much more wonderful the eat, searching, overwhelming e of God! All eternity past and l eternity to come on that ret-
a. The eyes with which we look to each other's face to-day sug-st it. It stands written twice your face and twice on mine, less through casualty one or th have been obliterated. "He at formed the eye, shall he not e?" Oh, the eye of God! It es our sorrows to assuage them, es our perplexities to disentane them, sees our wants to sym-athize with them. If we fight
m back, the eye of an antagon-
. If we ask his grace, the eye an everlasting Friend.

You often find in a book or anuscript a star calling your atntion to a footnote or explana-on. That star the printer calls asterisk. But all the stars of e night heavens are asterisks alling your attention to God, an l observing God. Our every erve a divine handwriting. Our ery muscle a pulley divinely swung, ur every bone sculptured with divine ggestiveness. Our every eye a reflec-on of the divine eye. God above us, nd God beneath us, and God before us,
nd God behind us, and God within us.
What a stupendous thing to live! What stupendous thing to die! No such thing s hidden transgression.

A dramatic advocate in olden times at ight in a court-room persuaded of the nocence of his client, charged with urder, and of the guilt of the witness ho was trying to swear the poor man's fe away—that advocate took up two right lamps and thrust them close up to ne face of the witness and cried: "May please the court and gentlemen of the ry, behold the murderer!" and the man ractically under that awful glare, con-ssed that he was the criminal instead of he man arraigned at the bar. O, my iends, our most hidden sin is under a righter light than that; it is under the urning eye of God.

He is not a blind giant stumbling hrough the heavens. He is not a blind onarch feeling for the step of his chariot.
Are you wronged? He sees it. Are you oor? He sees it. Have you domestic erturbation of which the world knows othing? He sees it. "Oh," you say, "my ffairs are so insignificant I can't realize hat God sees me and sees my affairs."
an you see the point of a pin? Can you ee the eye of a needle? Can you see a note in the sunbeam? And has God given you that power of minute observation and does he not possess it himself? "He that formed the eye, shall he not see?"

But you say, "God is in one world and I am in another world; he seems so far off from me I don't really think he sees what is going on in my life." Can you see the sun ninety-five million miles away? and do you not think God has as prolonged vision? But you say, "There are phases of my life and there are colors, shades of color in my annoyances and my vexations that I don't think God can understand." Does not God gather up all the colors and all the shades of color in the rainbow? And do you suppose there is any phase or any shade in your life that he has not gathered up in his own heart?

Beside that, I want to tell you it will soon all be over, this struggle. That eye of yours so exquisitely fashioned and strung and hinged and roofed will before long close in the last slumber. Loving hands will smooth down the silken fringes. So he giveth his beloved sleep.

A legend of Saint Frotobert is that his mother was blind and he was so sorely pitiful for the misfortune, that one day in sympathy he kissed her eyes and by miracle she saw everything. But it is not a legend when I tell you that all the blind eyes of the Christian dead under the kiss of the resurrection morn shall gloriously open. Oh, what a day that will be for those who went groping through this world under perpetual obscuration, or were dependent on the hand of a friend, or with an uncertain staff felt the way; and for the aged of dim sight, about whom it might be said that "they which look out of the windows be darkened," when eternal daybreak comes in!

What a beautiful epitaph that was for a tombstone in a European cemetery:
"Here reposes in God, Katrina, a saint, 85 years of age and blind. The light was restored to her May 10th, 1840."

Called Home!

("God is calling me." D. L. Moody on his day of departure)

GOD calls him home! At such command [down;
Well may he lay his loved work
God calls him to the heav'nly land.
To victor's palm and harp and crown.

God calls him home! He is not dead,
The mortal here awhile shall sleep;
The soul to higher service sped,
The grave the treasured dust shall keep.

God calls him home! His star has set
To rise on the Eternal shore:
For him shall be no vain regret,
He lives and reigns forevermore.

God calls him home! How rich the field
Of earth-sown seed that meets his eyes;
Of golden grain, how rich the yield.
To fill the garners of the skies.

In the Land of the Patriarchs

Gospel Progress Among the Cities that Border the Great Mesopotamian Plains—A Region of Many Tongues and Creeds

A CITY that is set on a hill cannot be hid." To the traveler crossing the northern end of the great Mesopotamian plain, the city of Mardin, stretched along the southern slope of Mt. Masius, sixteen hundred feet above the level of the plain, is a conspicuous object, and may be seen from a distance of several days' journey. Reliable statistics are an unknown quantity in this land, and its population is reckoned all the way from 20,000 to 30,000 souls, the smaller number, perhaps, being more nearly correct.

A district of some 30,000 square miles, lying mainly to the east and south of Mardin, with a population of over a million people, constitutes the southernmost of the five stations of the Eastern Turkey Mission of the American Board. It is the only station now under the care of that Board in which the Arabic language is used as the medium of communication with the people, though the Arabic is only one of half a dozen languages in more or less general use among them.

A CHRISTIAN MISSION SCHOOL IN THE ORIENT, SHOWING GROUPS OF PUPILS

Whether viewed from the standpoint of race, of language, or of religion, the people of this region are of the most heterogeneous character. Going out into the city, one may meet Arabs, Kurds, Turks, Armenians, Jews, and may hear the corresponding languages. Turkish is everywhere the official language of the country. In a large part of the field Kurdish is the common tongue, and in some villages little is heard but the Tooranee, derived from the ancient Syriac. The ancient Syriac itself, though not understood by the common people, still survives in the services of the Jacobite Syrian Church, while the Peshito version of the Scriptures and writings of church fathers in that tongue are held in almost idolatrous veneration.

In religion, the larger part of the population is nominally Moslem, but there are also many Yezidees (devil-worshipers), some Jews, and a large Christian element, made up of adherents of the old Jacobite Syrian, Kaldean and Armenian churches, and Catholics and Protestants.

Forty years ago an American missionary took up his residence in Mardin, and ever since a current of evangelical influences has been flowing forth into all this region. From the first, the one aim of missionary effort has been not so much to propagate any specific form of Christian faith as to preach the pure Gospel and to plant and foster self-sustaining Gospel institutions. While we firmly believe that the Gospel is for all, and that eventually all will be brought to accept it and share in its blessings, it has been found necessary for the present to direct effort to the nominal Christians, whose religion consists mainly in a dead formalism, utterly destitute of spiritual life and power, so that they constitute the chief obstacle to the progress of the Gospel among the non-Christian population. Yet, when they shall once again come under the power of the living Gospel, they will be the most efficient agency for reaching the followers of other creeds.

Such progress has been made toward the realization of the aim just mentioned that now the most important part of the missionary's work is not so much simply preaching the Gospel as it is preparing a native agency, and, through a general supervision, helping to give direction to the forming of institutions in the land. Care has been taken from the first to throw such responsibility upon the native brethren that they shall feel that the work is theirs and that the missionaries are here, and foreign aid is given only temporarily, until they shall become strong enough to bear the whole burden. Before the "events" of four years ago one missionary spent most of his time in touring the field, supervising the work of preachers and teachers and visiting new places where a footing had not been gained; but since that time he has been mainly engaged in relief work and the care of orphans.

Another missionary is in charge of the high school, which is virtually a training school preparing preachers and teachers, and at the same time giving opportunity for more advanced and better education than can be obtained elsewhere between Beirut and Urumia. The third male missionary is a skilful physician and surgeon, who finds his time fully occupied with the care of the hospital and a large medical practice. The three missionaries, with four native brethren chosen by the association of churches, form a committee for the general direction of the whole work of the field. Two single ladies, with such help as the three married ladies can give, carry on work for women. Colportage and Bible-reading are most important lines of work, though the former, like missionary touring, has, through force of circumstances, been discontinued since 1895.

While figures can give no adequate showing of the work that is actually being done, they may help to some conception of its progress. There are now in this field six organized churches, with 366 members, more than a tenth of them added in 1898. In twenty places regular preaching is maintained to aggregate average congregations of 1,400, while adherents number 2,400. Forty-five native helpers—preachers, teachers and Bible-readers—are in service. Five prominent young men are half way through a theological course. During the school year just closed seventy-three pupils were in attendance in the boys' high school, and thirty-nine in the girls' high school, while twenty-one day schools had an enrollment of over 600 pupils. Over 7,500 patients received medical treatment.

Though our work is restricted and hampered in many ways, yet the leaven is working—secretly, slowly, but surely. A brighter day is to come.

Fireside Talks About Jesus

Christ's Early Ministry

By Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Crafts.
Int'l S. S. Lesson for Jan. 28.
Matt. 3: 13 to 4: 11.

His Messianic Work

WHEN the cross-roads farmers and their families had gathered for their usual home department study of the life of Christ in the Sabbath twilight, Uncle Will opened the little meeting with these words:

"John the Baptist knew the value of sentiment and symbol and ceremony, though he was the most practical of preachers and the divinely appointed iconoclast of heartless forms, which, for centuries before he came, had monopolized religious meetings, unmixed with any prophetic voice. In John's services, preaching was the chief thing. When congregations, in rare instances, get such fearless rebukes to-day, they cry out for the 'Gospel,' as if it were something else. John considered it 'good news' to tell one's own hearers of their own sins and how to be rid of them."

"If John were to visit our city churches," said Selah Brown, "his ax would trim down the increasing preliminaries of those churches where it is coming to be said that 'the minister is a good thing to rest the choir.'"

"But," said Saunders, the Scotchman, glancing at his Quaker wife in mild defiance, "he was not one of those pendulum reformers who swing from too much to nothing, and so he pictured the purity, the putting away of the old sinful life, which the Jews had hidden under a network of symbolism, in the one simple ceremony of baptism."

The Baptism in the Jordan "Let us go in thought," said Mrs. Isaacs, the Christian Jewess, "to Nazareth on the morning of Christ's thirtieth birthday. His mother has already been to the corner of their one-room home in which she keeps the casket which the magi brought, and has asked her heart anew, as often before, why this divinely begotten, star-heralded child has become nothing more than a carpenter. These thoughts have been dispelled by the birthday shouts of the younger brothers and sisters of Jesus. On his lips they have tallied the years with kisses. The table is loaded with oranges and figs and pomegranates that have been secretly gathered for the joyous day, to supplement the usual plain fare of barley bread and olives. Breakfast is hardly over, when a neighbor comes in with exciting news that a new prophet has appeared down in the wilderness of Judea, who is calling the people to put away their sins and prepare for the appearance of the long-expected Messiah. At these tidings, Mary looks at Christ silently, but with a great question in her eyes. A strange awe comes over Christ, such as afterwards made even his apostles fall back and leave him to walk on alone. He takes down his outer robe—which suggests that he contemplates a journey, and not a brief one—and bids Mary and his brothers and sisters a loving good-by. He climbs down the hills to the South and pauses a moment to view the historic Valley of Esdraelon below him—his country's chief battlefield. He feels that he is entering a conflict against yet mightier foes, visible and invisible. Through the valley he walks alone to the Jordan and down its banks until he descries a vast crowd at the river-side. John has ceased preaching and is now baptizing. Jesus, who was then unknown to John, goes forward for baptism."

"That is the moment," observed Mrs. Uncle Will, "if you will permit me to interrupt your story, which Carlo Maratta represents in his great painting. Uncle Will calls it 'the mental crucifixion of Christ.' The touches of red in the cheeks and nostrils suggest the keen mental pain of a pure nature to be even for a moment in the attitude of one who has sinned."

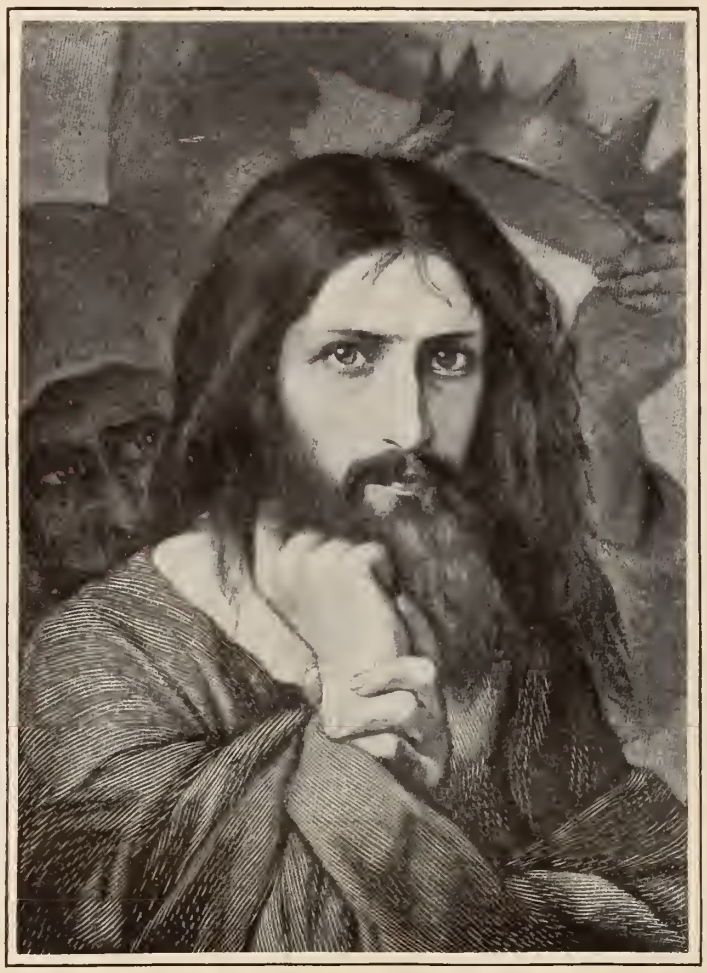
The Opened Heavens "But," said Saunders, "his character was soon proclaimed. The descending dovelike light was the previously appointed signal by which John was assured that this was the long-expected Messiah. He cried out to the crowd, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' and would have suspended the baptism, saying to Jesus, 'I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?' But Jesus insisted on becoming as perfect an example in religion as he had already been in daily living. To me the sweetest thought in all this story is that it was faithfulness in his boyhood and in the long and lowly years of mechanical toil to which that word out of the opened heavens must chiefly refer: 'Thou art my beloved Son; in thee I am well pleased.' Nothing better could God say at the Transfiguration when he had added the professional life of a doctor and teacher. That was a wise bootblack who thought a 'good job' at his trade would 'please God.'"

"I remember," said Tom Brown, "that such approvals in Bible times often came from heaven even upon men who in human imperfection sought to do God's will—the fire descending upon Abel's and Elijah's altars; Abraham's testimony that his ways pleased God; Joshua's cheer from heaven as he took the arduous duties of leading Israel, 'Be of good courage;' the baptism of Gideon's fleece; the word to Paul amid persecution, 'Fear not; I am with thee;' sweetest of all, the angel's message to Daniel, 'Thou art greatly beloved.' Not now in audible speech, but surely in whispers of peace, every young man starting out on a Christlike life receives the divine approval, whether he follows Christ in hammering or healing."

"As to the mode of baptism," Uncle Will remarked, "we shall all agree that the most important thing is that our baptism should be like that of Jesus in that we too shall have the baptism of the Spirit and the divine witness that our ways please God."



THE TEMPTATION OF CHRIST

The Tempted Christ "How strange," said Mr. Isaacs, a Hebrew-Christian, "that Jesus should have found it only a step from the door of heaven to the gates of hell, even as Elijah went from the mount of victory straight to the juniper tree. No sooner had Jesus come to the full consciousness that he was the Messiah, than temptations which were of a lofty type suggested by his mission, thronged upon him with such force that for forty days in the wilderness he forgot to eat. We are told of only the concluding temptations, which are given as samples only of those he encountered all his life."

"The first thing," said Saunders, "that strikes me in the temptation story, is that it was in the wilderness that Christ encountered his greatest temptations, as if to warn the monks of every age that they cannot escape the devil by moving into the country."

"That reminds me," said Mrs. Uncle Will, "of some boy monks I have known whose parents have attempted a too-absolute seclusion, cutting them off almost totally from other children. Henry, was an only child, whom his father, a clergyman, shut away almost entirely from other children, fearing that he would learn some evil from them. While other children were engaged in merry sports, he was a silent, hungry onlooker from the monastery of his own yard, where he was tethered by an invisible chain. He was not allowed to attend the public school, but had lessons every day alone with his father as his teacher. When a bicycle was purchased for him, he was not permitted to ride through the street, but only in a circumscribed circle in his own yard, where one might have thought he was training for a circus. He was not even permitted to go to Sabbath School, because, once upon a time, he got into a squabble with a classmate. This conventionalized child monk calls up the words of Emerson:

All are needed by each one,
Nothing is good or fair alone.

'I pray not,' said Jesus, 'that thou wouldst take them out of the world, but that thou wouldst keep them from the evil.'"

Conceptions of the Tempter "Speaking of monks," said Mrs. Smith, mother of Mabel and Frank, "I notice that at least three modern artists represent the devil coming to Christ in the pious garb of a monk or fakir. One of these, by Concilius, seems to me the most powerful of all pictures of this mystic scene. My Frank finds a grim satisfaction in the Apollyon of our illustrated Pilgrim's Progress, which combines with the horns and hoofs of a cow, the wings of a bat, all strangely attached, in medieval fashion, to the body of a man; but we cannot think such a hideous creature could tempt Christ or anybody else. Jesus was 'tempted as we are,' and therefore by an invisible tempter, no doubt; and the whole action described in the temptation story was probably one of thought."

"To a Jew," said Mr. Isaacs, "it is clear that these temptations are, in the main, inducements to substitute the devil's short cuts of politics for the slower and surer sta manship of Christ in the development the Kingdom of God; that is, the Ch tianizing of society. 'Use your mira power to conquer the Romans quick suggested the tempter, 'rather than pend on your teachings to conv them slowly. Get your crown as a wo ruler in short order by force rather th waste centuries in winning it by con tion.'"

"The essence of the first temptatio said Uncle Will, "is the temptation to dulge any appetite harmfully or to our God-given powers for selfish en If we could come off victorious in t larger battles with natural desires, must get in the habit of winning lesser battles; for instance, when tempt to eat what would harm us, or to sleep wh duty calls us to rise. Christ had just come the consciousness of miracle power, and w should he not use it to turn stones to bre as he came out of his forty days of fastin Because God gave him that power for spiritu uses. So the man whom God makes an art must not choose his subjects by the test the salesroom, but paint what God gives h to paint and sing what God gives him to si 'Man shall not live by bread alone.' T 'word,' that is, the will of God, as revealed one's talent, is to be first, and the 'bread' secondary matter. We must never sacrifi true life for 'a living.' 'A man may ste rather than starve,' says a Catholic cardin 'A man may lie rather than die,' says Methodist editor. Both are cases of trusti the father of lies instead of the Father truth and love.

"You have perhaps heard" he added, "abo Knud Iverson, the little Norwegian boy Chicago; how, as he was going for his fathe cow, a company of boys wanted him to ste some apples from a gentleman's garden, a threatened that if he did not they would du him in the river; and how the noble boy lowed himself to be actually drowned rath than consent to do wrong. Will those wh argue that one may lie to save life carry th theory to its next logical step, and say th this boy should have stolen rather than ri his life?"

The Second Temptation "The second temptation," sa Saunders, "is yet more subtl The tempter says to-day: 'Ca yourself down into a life of sin, for God is good he will interpose that you may not st fer the consequences.'"

"That calls up a story I am proud to tell our Frank," said Mr. Smith. "It came to n from one of the other boys. Frank was e gaged in playing with a friend named Willi In the place where their sport was carried c stood a cherry tree, full of ripe fruit. 'Frank!' cried Willie, 'let us pick some of the nice red cherries.' 'No,' said Frank, 'you kno we were told not to touch one of them.' 'Bu Frank, there is no one here to see us; yo needn't be afraid. And, if your father shou find out that we took them, he is so kind th he would not hurt you.' 'That is why I wou not touch them,' said Frank. 'I know m father would not hurt me; yet for me to di obey, would hurt him, and I would not wish grieve him for the world.' Another kind of boy, threatened with merited punishmen saucily responded, 'I don't care what you do Jesus takes care of me.' The kindness of Go should keep us from sinning, but there is a other side. God will not prevent his law from taking their course, if you leap into roaring torrent; and no more will he if fro your heart temple you deliberately plung down into sin."

"That third temptation," said Saunders, "w often meet; it is the temptation to achiev desirable results by the devil's short cuts; fo instance, getting money for the relief of th poor by charity balls, lotteries and theatr benefits."

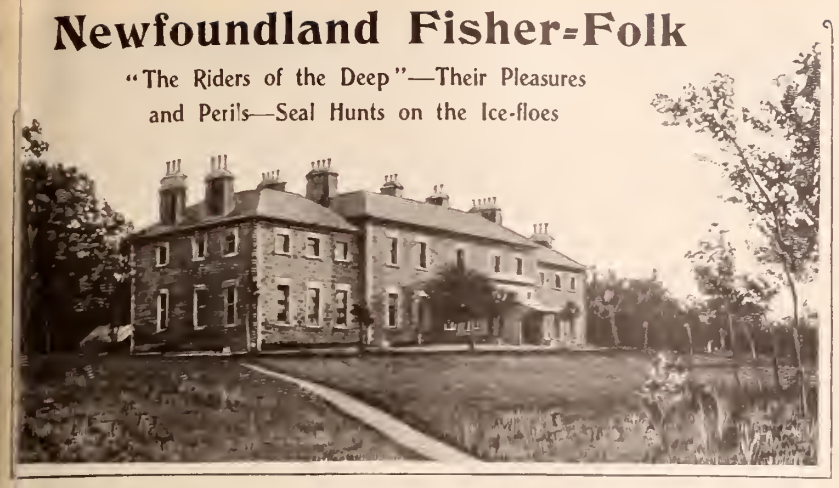
"Christ's victorious shield, the Bible, he ha passed on to us in stronger form," said Uncl Will. "It was a leaf of the much-belittle Deuteronomy which Christ thus quoted a the sure word of God. Our shield is a muc larger Bible than Jesus had."

Tom Brown at this point turned about h home blackboard:

"We must not forget," said Mrs. Uncle Will, "how, after temptation, angels came to ministe to Christ. They come to us in the very mids of temptation. And why may we not be a angels ourselves to strengthen the tempte young men about us whom we are looking a askance, instead of giving them a word o warning and help?"

Newfoundland Fisher-Folk

"The Riders of the Deep"—Their Pleasures and Perils—Seal Hunts on the Ice-floes



"GOVERNMENT HOUSE," ST. JOHNS, N. F.

ENGLAND'S oldest colony, the home of the Riders of the Deep and their wives, is to many a New-Found-Land, as it was to most parts of the world at the time of its discovery by John Cabot, in 1497. I spent three months there in health-seeking nd met with the greatest hospitality om the highest of rank to the humblest herman in the outports. I might de- ribe scenery that would vie with Nor- ay's: but it was the common people who terested me most—the simple, earnest her-folk.

Alternately the Island had been in the ssession of the French and English; d Newfoundland's fisheries, "richer an the gold mines of Peru," have fre ently been cause for national conten- ons. After the rebellion and famine in Ire- nd in 1798, and after each succeeding mine, the people from Erin came in owds to St. hns, for this ort was ever en to all. The cotch, from ne to time. ame in moder- e numbers. he very first ettlers were om Devon- ire, England, nd stanch, gged charac- rs they were. s readers of the ecular press e aware the rench shore eaty is now (as has been for any years), one Newfound- nd's greatest oblems. At e treaty of trecht, 1713, hen New- undland was finally ceded to England, e privilege was assured to France of king and drying fish on about one-third f the coast, and six different treaties ave confirmed this privilege.

Thus it is that there is here an inter- ingling of English, Scotch and Irish, nd while the Queen's English is still re- ained, and there are many finely edu- ated people, there is a strong Irish ccent of the "Auld Counthrie" of years go among the fisher-folk. All the coves, hich dent like fjords the shores of the sland, making an ever-changing and icturesque scene, are filled with fishing illages, which originally were inhabited y people of English or Irish nationality, ho may now be termed with the blend- ng of the nations—for fishermen of all nds have frequented this coast—and dded time, distinctly Newfoundlanders. Here—and not uncommonly in the streets f St. Johns—one hears the broad salu- ation of "Good-marnin'," and the hearty nquiry "How are ye-atall."

Speech is often contracted and unintel- gible. From the outport of Torbay, for nstance, a woman coming to the door to sell er blueberries, will inquire, "Have any urts?" meaning "hurtleberries." "Tackle nd untackle your horse" is a common hrase. Many words now obsolete, nd not found in Webster or Worcester are used locally. For instance, a small "yaffle" will denote as many fish as can be held in two hands. Rain will be predicted thus: "We're going to have some dirt," or "We're going to have some weather." The courtesy of an old Irishman in the country is expressed thus, "Come out an' see us! Plenty o' 'ospitality; country's tay is better than the town's tay anny day!" The fisher-folk are superstitious; their hearts are warm, alive to any sorrow, hospitable to the core. Accustomed to scenes of shipwreck and disaster, they meet trouble bravely as an every-day occurrence. It is their duty to be heroic, and they parade not their good deeds.

There had been a terrible storm on the northern Atlantic, and all along its coast there was still an angry sea. I was boarding the seaworthy steamer Bruce, anchored among the rocks at Port aux Basques. An old fisherwoman, to whom I had already said good-by, came hurriedly through the gale of wind on the wharf, pushing the people aside as she came. "Sure, Miss, you're not going to go in such a sea as this; come, lay over, come up to my own house; there's tea and potatoes, and bread and molasses—and a bed as long as you want." I said I must go, and thanked her: "Well, then, if you must go, leave something behind you, and you'll come back to us sure." They have many superstitions similar to the one indicated in her remark.

THE COVE OF QUIDI VIDI ("BEAUTIFUL VIEW")

Near St. Johns, each little cove of Quidi Vidi (meaning "beautiful view," and corrupted in everyday parlance to "Kitty Vitti") has its own church, school, etc. A beautiful spot is Kitty Vitti—hewn out by nature from the huge boulders. The hard-working fishermen have few hours for leisure or for needed rest, or the women either, during the making of cod. Yet these women will stop and talk most courteously with a stranger, and I have gained many valuable points of information from them; the same is true of the fishermen on various wharves. The making of cod is no easy task. Women are seen day after day turning and drying the fish on flakes, covered with spruce boughs. Greatest care must be taken; for if one fish is imperfect it discredits the whole pile with the purchasing merchant at market. These women look very picturesque in their short skirts and their three-cornered capes, worn over the head. Many a time would they stop and tell a good story or give some fishwife-witticism, like "The cod was so salt that it cooked itself," or an invitation to "Come into me house and have a cup o' tay. The man's away." They have good tea and they know how to make it.

The March and April seal-hunt in the ice-seas of the North are hazardous trips. The humane must grieve over the killing of thousands upon thousands of seals. The seals cry like human children when attacked, yet this hunt is the greatest source of revenue to those who need it sorely. I was at St. Johns in March, when the great seal-hunt was on among the northern ice-floes. In the beautiful, almost land-locked harbor of St. Johns, "as sweet a day as ever you'd see"—said Skipper Jackson to me—"fourteen vessels, with all their sails set, were steaming out toward the broad sea." On the shore were the wives of these Riders of the Deep. The last good-by had been said to wives and mothers and sweethearts, too, to whom they might never return; and up from each vessel arose as one grand chorus a song like this:

To the ice, to the ice we go, we go!
Brave in life, brave in death—we go, we go!

The fisherman's greatest danger, however, is not of the seal hunt and the ice-floes; it is that which comes from strong drink—the peril of the sea-faring man everywhere. Smuggled whiskey comes in somehow through all the ports. Lady Thorborn, of St. Johns, is at the head of a Temperance Union, organized a few years ago, and which has put forth earnest, though yet unsuccessful efforts to prevent this. There is room and to spare for missionary effort among the cove-dwellers; this is not to say, however, that faithful labor has not and is not being done by the various denominations, which are chiefly Church of England, Scotch Presbyterian, Wesleyan Methodists, and Roman Catholic. All Newfoundland, and St. Johns, in particular, owes a great deal to Rev. Dr. Moses Harvey. Every philanthropic movement of consequence that has been started in St. Johns in recent years has profited by his interest, influence and devotion.

On one side of Kitty Vitti harbor the folks are all Roman Catholics; on the other, Episcopalians. They have very little to do with each other until Christmas eve, when they visit back and forth, and all together attend midnight mass on the Catholic side. On New Year's eve the Catholics all come over to the Protestant side and join the Episcopalian congregation in listening to an historical sermon in the Episcopal Church. M. B.

Seattle's Wayside Mission

A Rescue Work in Seattle, Wash., which has Been Greatly Blessed

NO more appropriate name could be given to an effort to fulfill Christ's commission in scattering the seed by the wayside, than has been bestowed upon the Wayside Mission of Seattle, Wash. This Mission was founded by Alexander De Soto a little over a year ago. Doubtless many readers of this journal will remember the little party of men who set out from the Old Bowery Mission a few years ago, intending to walk across the continent to Seattle, and thence to the Klondike. The leader of this party was Captain de Soto, a New York business man, whose conversion had wrought a marvelous change in his life and aspirations. On arriving at Seattle, the season being too far advanced to proceed further, Mr. De Soto was impressed with the favorable opening there for a Gospel Mission. A suitable building was engaged on 316 Railroad avenue, a few blocks from the worst resorts in Seattle. The first meeting was held Nov. 8, 1898, just one year from the day that the party left New York. The Mission hall was thronged and men were brought to Christ even in those first meetings. In the rear part of the building a free dispensary was fitted up for giving advice and medicine to the sick poor. Since the Mission was opened between four and five thousand have received free medical aid and attendance, and in many homes suffering ones found without medical care have been also aided. In this branch of the work, Capt. De Soto has been assisted by Dr. E. L. Johnson, and also by Miss Jane Beyers, a medical student.

Both indoor and open-air Gospel meetings have been greatly blessed. Outdoor meetings have been held on what is known as the "Billy's Mug" Corner—a neighborhood where every door is a saloon. By these means many thousands have heard the Gospel. The hungry, the homeless, the sick and the friendless of Seattle have cause to bless the Wayside Mission.

The Mission dispenses about sixty or seventy free meals a day, or about 25,000 a year. Capt. De Soto has enlisted the sympathy and help of many consecrated workers from the Seattle churches. The Free Methodist, Baptist and Congregational churches are warmly interested, and aid the work freely. One of the chief supporters of the Mission is Judge Roger S. Greene, of the Tabernacle (Baptist) church. Substantial aid has come from the North Baptist Church. A Mr. Duffy has furnished one hundred loaves of bread every week for over a year. The faculty and students of Seattle Seminary have taken an active part in conducting the meetings. Their Friday night services, led by Prof. M. C. Clarke, have been a blessing to many. All the domestic work of the Mission is done by converts who make it their home. No collections are taken. The work has been conducted entirely on faith, and its spiritual results have been far-reaching.

The Two-Fold Danger from Polygamy

MORMONISM is a political power disguised under the cloak of religion. It already has great political holdings in several of the States. The men who want office are required to consult the Mormon authorities in Utah. But the new movement which Mr. Roberts leads, is to secure from the country a recognition of the claims of polygamy. In his book, A New Witness for God, Mr. Roberts argues that man's spirit is the literal offspring of God; that man has not only a Father, but a mother in heaven, and that the power of endless increase will contribute to the dominion of those who attain by their righteousness to these privileges. In other words, he argues that heaven itself is a vast theatre of polygamous life, of which the Creator is the Supreme Head. This is taught as against the teachings of the Son of God, whose words are that in the future world there is no marrying nor giving in marriage, but that the inhabitants shall be as the angels of heaven.

A Strange History

LAST July, Benjamin D. Maxham died at Vineland, N. J., leaving $100,000 to found the New Jersey Training School for Feeble-Minded Children. In early life he had been a gambler, owning a large number of faro banks in San Francisco and Virginia City. He was a man of large proportions, with an immense head and strong features. Mr. Maxham was born in Woodstock, Vt., in 1821; ran away to sea; deserted the ship in Brazil; learned photography; located in San Francisco, and there made his fortune. Later he established a miners' supply house in Virginia City, conducting also a banking business. While there, according to The Christian Advocate, this incident, related by himself, occurred in his career:

"One evening I noticed that my watch-dog put his head to the brick flooring of my establishment and growled. He did so again, and on the third night I grew suspicious and put my ear to the spot where the dog had repeatedly growled. 'Click, click, click' were the sounds that reached me. Robbers tunneling for my bank, thought I. Then I figured upon a scheme to fix them. My place was located upon a hill sloping toward a river about 200 yards distant. The next day I walked along the river bank and discovered the opening to the tunnel. Early that evening I drew a straight line from my house to the tunnel entrance, and about midway between bored several holes about ten feet deep with a long auger. These I filled with powder. At about midnight, when the sounds of digging were again heard beneath my house, I touched off the fuse, and a tremendous explosion followed. I never heard that clicking noise again under my house. Those robbers, who would undoubtedly have murdered me, dug a tunnel which turned out to be their grave. A couple of men were missed from the town, but nobody in the State of Montana ever knew their fate except myself."

Late in life Mr. Maxham settled in Vineland, became a trustee in the Presbyterian church, became a great reader of Drummond's books, and finally made the above generous bequest for feeble-minded children. His last years were very serious, and he was anxious to leave any subject for religious conversation.

A Word with Our Readers

WE are in receipt of letters from several of our readers, who take us to task because this journal has not enthusiastically espoused the cause of England in the South African war. To these well-meaning inquirers we have simply to say that to advocate the cause of either belligerent would be wholly inconsistent on the part of a journal which upholds the principles of the Prince of Peace, as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has always aimed to do. Far from advocating or approving war, we conceive it to be the duty of a Christian newspaper to exert its influence toward dissuading nations and governments from adopting the sword as a means of settling their difficulties, and to urge arbitration instead.

With regard to those of our readers who have written to us in the way of friendly criticism concerning "Aunt Samantha's Journey," we are happy to state that since the recent publication in these columns of a letter from a St. Louis subscriber, we have received hundreds of letters, the writers of which express their high appreciation of Miss Holley's admirable work. They recognize her wonderful ability and her influence as a moral and social reformer, and they believe, with us, that her writings will be read by, and will make their impress upon the lives of, very many who could never be reached by ordinary literary methods, even in a Christian newspaper.

We regard the net increase of 35,000 in our subscription list, over last year, as conclusive evidence of the popular appreciation in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its work are held by the great religious reading community. It is a magnificent and most gratifying testimony to the character and results of the work to which, under Divine blessing, it has been called in the past, and an evidence of absolute confidence in its policy for the future.

Sympathy for the Queen

THE splendors of a throne cover up, so far as our eyes are concerned, the grief of royalty. But the sorrows of those who live in palaces are as wearing and exhausting as those who live in cabins. How much of sadness Queen Victoria has suffered since five o'clock in the morning of June 20th, 1837, she was awakened by a loud knocking at her door and soon after told she was Queen of England! In 1840, she dodged the bullet of Edward Oxford while riding in Hyde Park. Again and again "the Boy Jones," as he was called, was found secreting himself in Buckingham Palace, for what purpose no one can positively know. He said it was only for the pleasure of coming into the presence of the Queen, but there was suspicion that he hid there for a different purpose. In 1842, on Constitution Hill and in Green Park she was twice assailed by one, John Francis, her life saved in the one instance by the fact that the pistol missed fire, the villain standing within two paces when he took aim.

Another attempt upon her life was made by Bean, the hunchback. The year 1861 has been called by the Queen "the year of sorrow," because that year her husband, Prince Albert, died. In 1878, her daughter, Princess Alice, died. Then through many of the years of her reign were cut the deep trenches of battle-fields. Who can tell what the queenly sympathy must have felt in 1857, when the groan of Lucknow and Cawnpore and Delhi made all nations shudder. What must have been her heart-twich when the Prince Imperial of France was sacrificed for England? Would that the evening of her life might have heard no sound of clashing hosts! But this is denied her. Whether sympathizing with the English or the Boers in the awful conflict now raging in South Africa, all right-minded people will condole with the sorrow in Balmoral and Osborne and Buckingham palaces. Alas, that there is no escape from taking a copious draught from the bitter Marah! Edmund Burke, at the height of his fame, tearfully caressing the horse of his dead boy; Abraham Lincoln, desolate in the White House over the casket of "little Tad;" Lord Roberts promoted to the head of the English army while his son lies dead at the front of the regiment he was leading—all these only add to the doleful illustrations of what the exalted in place and power may be called to suffer. Let our prayers arise for all those whose honors are shadowed with storms of trouble. God comfort the queen!

A Great Success

NEVER have we derived more satisfaction from any business deal arranged for the benefit of our subscribers than from the great offer recently submitted to them in connection with the Concert Roller Organ. We made provision for a thousand of these excellent instruments, and the very first announcement resulted in the sale of more than half the entire number; and the letters of commendation which we are receiving from the purchasers are indeed very gratifying. For the home, for Sunday Schools, for Cottage Prayer Meetings and other social gatherings to the greater success of which music is likely to contribute, there is nothing superior to this Organ.

The instrument can be successfully operated by any child old enough to turn a crank; the music rollers are indestructible, being made of wood and steel; the music is continuous (no rewinding of paper music at the end of a verse), and the volume is sufficient to fill a good sized hall. Over a thousand different airs are now ready: religious, popular, patriotic and operatic, and these are sold at twenty-five cents each.

The Organs, with five pieces of music, are offered at $12 if purchased on instalments of a dollar a month, or at $10 for spot cash. The present stock closes the deal. No extension. The instrument is sold only to members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family. Address,

The Proposed Moody Endowment

At a meeting of Mr. Moody's friends, held in Northfield on the evening of his funeral, it was resolved that a statement regarding the institution, founded by him be given to the public. With this end in view the following was prepared:

"These institutions are unique in character, and offer an unequalled opportunity for young men and women of limited means to secure an education that will thoroughly equip them for Christian life and service. They consist of the Northfield Seminary and Training School for young women, Mount Hermon School for young men, and the Bible Institute, Chicago. All are incorporated.

"The Northfield plant consists of about 1,200 acres of land and about thirty buildings, beautifully situated and excellently equipped. With present endowment it is valued at two and a quarter millions, and is practically free from debt. At Chicago the buildings, land and endowment exceed $250,000 in value. The Northfield Schools have about 900 students each, who are charged $100 per annum for board and tuition. The actual cost is about $200. At Chicago the amount required approximates $150 each for 300 students. In brief, therefore, a sum of about $125,000 is annually required to maintain the work inaugurated by Mr. Moody on the principles successfully pursued for the past twenty years.

"This sum has heretofore been largely raised by his personal efforts. We believe his friends will now wish to express their appreciation of him and their gratitude to God for his accomplished work by sharing the responsibility bequeathed to his children by raising the present limited endowment to $3,000,000, the interest of which, at four per cent., would guarantee the perpetuation of his work in all its present prosperity. Such an endowment would be a monument to his memory more enduring than brass or marble, and just such a memorial as he himself would have most desired.

"The appeal is therefore made now to Mr. Moody's friends throughout the world to contribute (without curtailing their support of current expenses) to a Moody Memorial Endowment, notifying his elder son, W. R. Moody, East Northfield, Mass., of the amount they are moved to give."

BRIEF NOTES

Rev. Sydney C. Partridge has been appointed Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Japan. Negotiations have been opened with the English Church for the transfer of Episcopal jurisdiction to the American Bishop.

The late General Wauchope, who was killed by the Boers in South Africa recently, was an elder in the Church of Scotland. He sat in the last General Assembly, and also represented his church as deputy in the Irish Assembly.

The Fourth Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia recently celebrated its centennial. The congregations were large, many former members and friends of the church uniting with the present attendants in the celebration.

Mrs. Maggie Van Cott has been conducting revival services in New York. They were held in the Second Street M. E. Church, which was crowded night after night. The evangelist has lost none of her old-time power with the passage of years.

News comes from Pekin, China, of another martyrdom. A missionary of the Church Missionary Society named Brooks, was attacked and murdered by a Chinese seditious society. The crime was committed in Ping Yin, in the province of Shang Tung.

Rev. L. F. Jones, who is laboring in Alaska, reports that during 1899 the number of converts received was greater than in any previous year. Seventeen entire families joined the church, besides individual additions. He writes very hopefully of future prospects.

The Twenty-third Ave. Presbyterian Church of Denver, is rejoicing in a period of prosperity spiritual and financial. During the six years of the present pastorate of Rev. Francis E. Smiley, it has reduced its debt by thirty thousand dollars and has added more than five hundred names to the church roll.

Mrs. M. Baxter, who is now visiting missionary stations in India, writes that unless help comes speedily from other lands, large numbers of people must die of starvation. The Government is opening relief works, but if the missionaries had money they could save thousands of lives which must be lost before the relief camps get into operation.

Rev. F. H. Jacobs, who has been assisting Dr. A. C. Dixon in the pastorate of the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, will be glad to assist any pastor in evangelistic services. Mr. Jacobs assisted Mr. Moody in many of his late campaigns and is specially useful in the inquiry room and in the singing. His address is 237 Cumberland Street, Brooklyn.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie has given three hundred thousand dollars to extend the education work at Cooper Union, New York. The Cooper family in gratefully acknowledging the gift, announce a further gift of their own. They add two hundred thousand dollars to the fund, which makes an aggregate addition of half a million to this most beneficent institution.

At the annual meeting of Livingstone College, Bishop Tugwell testified to the inestimable value of medical knowledge in missionaries, saying that it enabled men to gain a friendly footing with the heathen and relieved much suffering. Through the influence of such missionaries infanticide, formerly common, has been much checked and in many districts abandoned.

The Y. M. C. A. of Yale University has organized a Bible class for Japanese students, of whom there are about twenty in the University. Some of them are Christians, but others are interested only on gaining secular knowledge. Earnest prayer is being offered that all these young men who, on their return to Japan will be professors in colleges, may go back earnest and avowed followers of Christ.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore, who is in her seventy-eighth year, surprises her friends by eagerly accepting invitations to lecture, and more work in the philanthropic causes in which she has so long labored. She lost her husband recently and she says that she finds in her work the best consolation in the heavy bereavement. She says: "My work is more to me now than money, sympathy, food or raiment."

The Conflict in South Africa

NEWS from the seat of war in South Africa during the week ended January 6, was chiefly concerned with the movements of Gen. French in the district, a map of which appears on this page. It appears that Gen. French succeeded in outflanking the Boers at Colesberg, which is on the southern border of the Orange Free State. He was, however, not strong enough to follow up his advantage and it is not clear whether he finally occupied the town. In attempting to push his way further he met with a reverse and one of his companies, comprising seven officers and seventy men, were made prisoners. Gen. Methuen has been unable to advance to the relief of Kimberley. His position on the Modder River was strengthened, but the Boers were in such force in front and on both flanks that he was unable to attack them, or to make an attempt to turn their position. The reports at the close of the week from Ladysmith increased the anxiety prevailing in Great Britain. After a heavy bombardment, the Boers on Saturday, Jan. 6, attacked the town in force. The garrison, though debilitated by short rations and disease, fought bravely and Gen. White signalled that the attack had been repulsed. It was, however, speedily renewed and with such vigor that Gen. White reported he was "very hard pressed." In the meantime, Gen. Buller, with a large force, little more than fifteen miles away, was unable to go to his assistance. As will be seen from the picture of the Tugela river on this page, the crossing of that stream, which flows between Gen. Buller's camp and Ladysmith, must be a hazardous undertaking. The hills are occupied by the Boers, who have artillery of long range and command every place at which the river is fordable. There have been generals who at any cost would have made the attempt on learning that another officer was in straits so desperate, but Gen. Buller does not appear to feel that he is justified in running so great a risk. The situation from a British standpoint is consequently very gloomy, and it remains to be seen whether even a veteran so able as Gen. Roberts, who is now on his way to the scene of action, can relieve the losses and blunders of the campaign. It is evident that the Boers were far better prepared for the war than were the British, and there must be many Englishmen who clamored for the conflict, who now must regret that they did not follow the advice of the wise king:

Go not forth hastily to strive, lest thou know not what to do in the end thereof, when thy neighbor hath put thee to shame (Prov. 25: 8).

Missed a Legacy

A strange suit has just been tried in a New Jersey court. It arose out of the sale of some building lots. The lawyer acting for the purchasers, in investigating the title, found that the land had once formed part of an estate which did not appear to have been formally settled. The estate had been disposed of by a will probated in 1866, the executors of which had omitted to get proper release and a discharge. Both executors were dead, and their heirs scattered. A copy of the will was secured, and a request was sent to the legatees, who are the trustees of a church in Vermont, for a formal release. The legacy was for a thousand dollars, but the trustees said it had never been paid to the church. As the residuary legatees are dead and there is no way of tracing their inheritance, the trustees brought suit against the present owners of the land which formed part of the estate. The court, however, has dismissed the suit, on the ground that the Statute of Limitations covered the case, and that whether the trustees knew or did not know of the legacy, they could not recover after an interval of thirty-four years. It may be hoped that the lesson thus taught may be useful to them and other church officers and members. There are rich blessings that God offers to those who seek them, which are not conferred on any who are indifferent to them:

Lest a promise being left us of entering into his rest, any of you should seem to come short of it (Heb. 4: 1).

A Dog in Prison

Among the prisoners committed by the Recorder, at Hoboken, N. J., last week, was a dog who received a sentence of sixty days' imprisonment for vagrancy. The sentence was pronounced at the urgent request of the dog's owner, who was also a prisoner. One of the dock policemen had found the man on a pier, and, suspecting that he was meditating suicide, took him to the station. The explanation the prisoner made was that he had been unable to obtain employment, and had walked up and down the pier to keep from freezing. The sergeant would have sent the man to the almshouse, but he refused to go unless his dog, a poor mongrel animal who had followed him to the station-house, was allowed to go with him. As this was against the rules, the man was detained as a vagrant and his dog was permitted to stay with him. In court, the next morning, the prisoner told the Recorder that he owed his life to his dog. The animal had awakened him on one occasion just in time for him to escape drowning. He had vowed then that he would never part with the dog, and he meant to keep his vow. He would go out into the streets and both die together rather than be separated. He stooped and patted the dog's head, saying he was the only friend he had left, and the dog looked up affectionately and licked his hand. The Recorder was so affected by the spectacle that he sentenced dog and man to sixty days in prison and the man followed by his dog, went contentedly away. He could not forget his obligation to his dog. Many men would have felt the same way, but how few there are, comparatively, who, while they know that Christ died to save them from a fate worse than death, feel similar gratitude to him.

He came unto his own, but his own received him not (John 1: 11).

Denied Her Husband

A remarkable scene was witnessed one day last week on the steps of a church in New York. There had been a wedding in the church and the bridal party was just coming out, when the bridegroom made some remark to his bride which those around could not hear. She became violently agitated and finally sank down fainting on the steps of the church. A crowd quickly gathered around the prostrate girl. A policeman, seeing it, hurried up and forced his way through. The bridegroom told him to go on about his business, as there was no need of his services. The policeman, however, insisted on staying till the girl recovered sufficiently to explain. When she regained consciousness, he asked her, among other things, who the man was who had tried to get rid of him. The girl said she did not know him and had never seen him before; but the man declared that she had just been married to him. The policeman took them both to the station, where the girl persisted in her statement that the man was a stranger to her. They were detained while an officer was sent to investigate. During his absence the two conversed, and finally the girl came out of the room where the pair had been waiting, and told the captain that they were "reconciled." She admitted that the man was her husband and they were allowed to depart together. The reconciliation of which the bride spoke, did not, however, explain the assertion that she had never seen the man before who was really her husband. Perhaps when she made it she had not fully recovered her senses, otherwise she would have known that she could not rid herself of her obligations by a statement so easily disproved. Some men would not have forgiven her for making it, and we are warned that when any of Christ's people act so, he treats the offence as specially heinous:

Even denying the Lord who bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction (II. Peter 2:1).

The Elixir of Life Found Again

Another announcement is made of the discovery of the Elixir of Life. Every few years some chemist appears who boasts of having discovered the long sought panacea for the ills that flesh is heir to, the tonic which will indefinitely prolong life. This time the discovery has been made in Paris. A newspaper correspondent recently visited the Pasteur Institute in that city, and found one of the professors, Prof. Metchnikoff—presumably from his name, a Russian—busy with a series of experiments. It had been accidentally found that if the blood of a rabbit were injected into a guinea pig, and then the blood of the guinea pig injected into a rabbit, the rabbit would die. But if only a minute portion of the guinea pig's blood were injected, the rabbit would be stimulated. An examination showed that after the injection, the red globules of the blood were more than doubled in number. The professor at once realized that if he had found a means of increasing the number of red globules in the blood, he had made a discovery of prime importance, for it is the deficiency of these red globules that leads to the decay of the cells of the human organism and the consequent symptoms of old age. He has therefore been making experiments to find out the size of the dose required for a man and the right kind of lymph to be given in special cases. It is little likely that the professor has found the real elixir, which has evaded the search of the ages. The only way in which men can attain their ambition to defy the passage of time and live forever is that which Christ came to reveal.

He that believeth on me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and he that liveth and believeth on me shall never die (John 11: 25).

SAMANTHA IN CALIFORNIA

THE next mornin' after we arrived at San Francisco, Robert Strong appeared at the hotel bright and early, and I don't know when I've ever seen anybody I liked so well. Miss Meechim invited me into her settin'-room to see him.

Havin' hearn so much about his deep, earnest nater and deathless desire to do all the good he could whilst on his earthly pilgrimage, I expected to see a grave, quiet man with lines of care and conflict engraved deep on his sober, solemn visage.

But I wuz never more surprised to see a bright, laughin', happy face that smiled back into mine as Albina Meechim proudly introduced her nephew to me.

Why, thinkses I to myself, where can such strength of character, such nobie purpose, such original and successful business habits be hidden in that handsome, smilin' face and them graceful, winnin' ways, as he laughed and talked with his aunt and Dorothy.

But anon at some chance word of blame and criticism from Miss Meechim, makin' light of his City of Justice and its inhabitants she looked down on, a light blazed up in his eyes and lit up his face, some as a fire in our open fireplace lights up the spare-room, and I see stand out for a minute on the background of his fair handsome face a picture of heroism, love, endeavor that fairly stunted me for a time. And I never felt afterwards anything but perfect confidence in him; no matter how light and trifling wuz his talk with Dorothy, or how gay and boyishly happy wuz his clear laughter.

He had worked well and faithful, givin' his hull mind and heart to his endeavor to do all the good he could and now he wuz bound to play well, and git all the good and rest he could out of his play spell. And I hadn't been with 'em more'n several hours before I thought that I had seen further into his heart and hopes and intentions than Miss Meechim had in all her born days.

Robert Strong, before he went away, invited us all to go and see his City of Justice and we agreed with considerable satisfaction to do so, or at least I did and I spoze the rest did. Miss Meechim would be happy in any place where her nephew wuz, that you could see plain, as much as she disapproved of his methods. Dorothy, I couldn't see so plain what she did think, she bein' one that didn't always let her lips say everything her heart felt, but she used Robert real polite, and we all had a real agreeable visit.

Out Sight-seeing

Robert got a big carriage and took us all out driving that afternoon, Miss Meechim and I settin' on the back seat, and Robert and Dorothy facing us, and Tommy perched on Robert's knee; Tommy jest took to him, and visey-versey. Robert thought he wuz just about the brightest little boy he had ever seen, and Tommy sot there, a little pale but happy, and wonnered about things, and Robert answered all his "wonners" so fur as he could.

We drove through beautiful streets lined with elegant houses, and the dooryards wuz a sight. Think of my little scraggly geraniums and oleanders and cactuses I've carried round in my hands all winter and been proud on. And then think of geranium and oleander trees just as common as our maples and loaded with flowers. And palm and bananna trees, little things we brood over in our houses in the winter, and roses that will look spindlin' with me, do the best I can, in December, all growin' out-doors fillin' the air with fragrance.

Sight-seeing at Seal Rock

Robert Strong said that we must go to the Cliff House, and Tommy wanted to see the seals.

Poor things! I felt bad to see 'em, and to think that there wuz a war of extermination tryin' to be waged aginst 'em, because they interfered with the rights of a few. One of the most interesting animals on the Western continent! It seems too bad they're tryin' to wipe 'em out of existence because the fishermen say they eat a sammon now and then. Why shouldn't they, who more than half belong to the water-world, once in a great while have a little taste of the good things of that world as well as to have 'em all devoured by the inhabitants of dry land? And they say that the seals eat sharks too—I should think that that paid for all the good fish they eat. But to resoom. Tommy didn't think of the rights or the wrongs of the seals, he had no disquictin' thoughts to mar his anticipations, but he wonnered if he could put his hands through 'em like he could his ma's seal muff. He thought that they wuz muffs, silk lined—the idee! And he "wonnered" a sight when he see the great peaceable lookin' creeters down in the water and on the rocks, havin' a good time, so fur as we could see, in their own world, and mindin' their own bizness; not tryin' to git ashore and kill off the fishermen, because they ketched so many sammons. And Tommy had to feed the seals and do everything he could do. Robert Strong helpin' him in everything he undertook and he "wonnered" if they would ever be changed into muffs, and he "wonnered" if they would like to be with "ribbin bows on."

At my request we went through Lone Mountain Cemetery, a low mountain rising from the sandy beach, full of graves shaded by beautiful trees, and myriads of flowers bending over the silent sleepers, the resistless sea washing its base on one side—just as the sea of Death is washing up aginst one side of Life—no matter how gay and happy it is.

We rode home through a magnificent park of two thousand acres. Money had turned the sandy beach into a wealth of green lawns, beautiful trees and myriads of flowers. I had always sposed that them Eastern Genis in the Arabian Nights had palaces and things about as grand and luxurious as they make, but them old Genis could have got lots of pinters in luxury and grand surroundin's if they'd seen the homes of these nabobs in the environins of San Francisco. No tongue can tell the luxury and elegance of them abodes, and so I hain't a goin' to git out of patience with my tongue if it falters and gins out in the task.

"AM I SPEAKIN' TO THE WIDDER STANFORD?"

The next mornin' while Miss Meechim and Dorothy wuz to the lawyers, tendin' to that bizness of hern and gittin' ready for their long tower, Robert Strong took me through one of them palaces. It stood only a little distance from the city and wuz occupied by one old gentleman, the rest of the family havin' died off and married, leavin' him alone in his glory. Well said, for glory surrounded the hull spot.

There wuz three hundred acres, all gardens and lawns and a drivin' park and a park full of magestick old live oaks, and acres and acres of the most beautiful flowers and all the choicest fruit you could think of.

The great stately mansion was a sight to go through—halls, libraries, gilded saloons, picture galleries, reception halls lined with mirrors, liard rooms, bowling alleys, whatever t may be, dining rooms, with mirrors tending from the floor to the lofty ceili

I wondered if the lonely old occup ever see reflected in them tall mirrors faces of them who had gone from him he sot there at that table, like some S omon on his throne. But all he had to wuz to press his old foot on a elect bell under the table, and forty serva would enter. But I'dno as he'd w em all—I shouldn't—it would take aw my appetite, I believe. Twenty carria of all kinds and thirty blooded hor wuz in his stables, them stables be enough sight nicer than any dwell house in Jonesville.

But what did that feeble old man w of twenty carriages? To save his life couldn't be in more than one to a tin and I am that afraid of horses, I felt t I wouldn't swap the old mair for the h on 'em.

At my strong request we made a tow one day to see Stanford University, t immense schoolhouse that is doin' much good in the world; why, good lan it is larger than you have any idee o why, take all the schoolhouses in Jon ville and Loontown and Zoar and put 'e all together, and then add to them all t meetin' houses in all them places a then it wouldn't be half nor a quarter big as this noble schoolhouse.

And the grounds about it are beautif beautiful! we wuz shown through t buildin', seein' all the helps to learning all kinds and the best there is in t world, and after that he went out on t grounds agin, and I sot down under shady tree, Dorothy and Robert wanti to go into another of the school building and Miss Meechim and Tommy walki down a beautiful side path. And I s there alone resting a little and meditat on the great good work one of my s wuz doin'.

"The Widder Stanford"

And even as methought I beheld a la walkin' down one of the paths towa me with a young girl by her side. A just as they got in front of me, the you girl called the lady, Mrs. Stanford. A even as she spoke, Mrs. Stanford seem to miss sunthin' and the young girl turn back to the house for it, and Mrs. Sta ford sot down nigh me, and my powerf emotions jest lifted me right up offen seat and carried me towards her, and sez in tones of feelin' and admiration:

"Am I speakin' to the widder Stanford

"TOMMY WANTED TO SEE THE SEALS"

And she said I wuz, she see in my face hy lofty emotions and spoke accordin'ly.

And I sez, "How glad I am to meet lou, Miss Stanford. Ever sence I've read f the great work you're doin' in helpin' loor boys and girls to an education I've anted to thank you for it and tell you lou're fittin' them out with the best and harpest tools there is to fight the world ith, and I've wanted to see you and tell lou how proud it makes me of the hull emale sect." And knowin' that she deerved to be encouraged jest as fur as he could, I added, "Josiah feels jest as I do."

"Josiah?" sez she inquiringly.

"Yes, Josiah Allen, my husband. I, too," ez I, with a chokin' voice, "am a widder o a certain extent, bein' parted away rom my pardner by land and water, and can sympathize with you, Widder Stanord, jest so fur as I've got." Sez I, "It's dretful lonesome state, I never realized t before."

She sithed deep and sez, "It wuz ineed."

And I went on, "If my feelin's are uch bein' parted away from a comanion by a tower, what must they be if he wuz gone into another world. But," ez I, wantin' to cheer her all I could, "jest think how the mantilly of sorrow hat wrops you round is starred with gems nd wreathed with flowers—gems of pure ratitude and love, and the posies of weet thoughts and remembrances. For ou must think sometimes of the good ou're doin', of the broad stream of helpul influences that flows out of this great nstitution of learning and goes on and n, broadening all the time and blessing nd refreshing a sad world. And," sez I, n a low, tender voice, "it is jest as the ittle lad, who has gone on, wants it to be. His eyes that closed too early, we all hought, on earthly seens, looks on ineffable beauty now in his new home, and he ees the dreams of his loving heart crysalized and taking shape day by day lown in his old home, under his ma's areful eye. He's looking down on you o-day," sez I. "Or why should say looking down when he is, believe clost by your side, holding up your arm that is weary ofttimes with its labor, soothing your poor for'ard when it aches with its burden of care and thought for others," sez I, lookin' dreamily off onto the green-shaded avenoos.

"He walks up and down these beautiful paths by his ma's side; he sees the great crowd of youths going out of these halls every year with praise and love for you and him in their hearts, going out to help the world to better living, to spread abroad the good they've got here. Don't you believe that the little lad is blessed and happy in seeing all this?"

She sez, "Yes, I do think so."

"Yes," sez I, "the hands that worldlings called dead and stopped forever from work reared up all them magestick walls and towers and arches," sez I, "he looks on and is happy. He that wuz so kind and helpful to every one, to the poor most of all, helped the world more in his death, than he could in his life."

"I know it," sez she, in a chokin' voice, "I know it."

"Well," sez I, pityin' her sad look, "a woman that has an angel of help for a child, how happy she ort to be." "But," sez she, "I have suffered! I have suffered!"

"Yes," sez I, "I know that, the cross of sorrow wuz laid on your shoulders and its weight most crushed you to the earth at first, but its sharp, heavy sides have turned to light as you bore it onwards. Yes, that cross of agony you bore has turned into a pillar of flame that lights dark places in this world; its light is streaming, streaming out, a lighthouse to help the sailors on life's tempestuous sea. Think of the thousands and thousands gropin' in darkness who will be helped by it into a happy haven years and years and years to come."

She looked brighter than she had looked; I had cheered her up considerable. And as I see the young girl returning I sez, rizin' up, "Widder Stanford, I will now bid you good-by, and say from my heart, God bless you and your noble work!"

She riz up, too, and our hands met in a clost pressure; we wuz congenial, we felt like old friends, but had to part, as old friends must in this world. Dorothy and Robert soon appeared, and Miss Meechim and Tommy jined us soon afterwards and we returned home shortly after. On my way home I said, onbeknown to me:

Invisible Witnesses

"How happy it must make young Leland Stanford to know that his death has done such grand work, and see it goin' on."

"Why," says Miss Meechim, "how could he see it? He's dead."

Sez I, "Don't you spoze the Lord would let him see what a great light his death has lit up in the world?" Sez I, "In my opinion he wuz right there to-day lookin' at it."

"That is impossible," sez she. "If he wuz there we should have seen him."

Sez I, "You don't see the X-rays that are all about you this very minute, but they are there. You can't see the great force Marconi uses to talk with, but it walks the earth, goes right through mountains, which you and I can't do, Miss Meechim. It is stronger than the solid earth or rock. That shows the power of the Invisible, that what we call the real is the transitory and weak, the invisible is the lasting and eternal. What we have seen to-day is sorrow crystalized into grand shapes. A noble young heart's ideal and aspirations wrought out by loving memory in brick and mortar, the Invisible guiding the eye, holding the hand of the Visible, building for time and eternity."

Miss Meechim's nose turned up toward the sky and she sniffed some. She wuz a foreigner; how could she know what I said. But Dorothy and Robert seemed to understand my language, though they could't quite speak it yet. And good land! I hain't learnt its A B C's yet, and don't spoze I shall till I get promoted to a higher school.

Well, it wuz on a lovely afternoon that we all went out to the City of Justice, and there I see agin what great wealth might do in lightening the burdens of a sad world. Robert Strong might have spent his money jest as that old man did whose place I have described, and live in still better style, for Robert Strong wuz worth millions. But he felt different; he felt as if he wanted his capital to lighten the burden on the aching back of bowed down and tired out Labor, and let it stand up freer and straighter for a spell. He felt that he could enjoy his wealth more if it wuz shared accordin' to the Bible, that sez if you have two coats give to him that hasn't any, and from the needy turn not thou away.

"ROBERT STRONG WAS WALKIN' BY MY SIDE"

That big building, or ruther that cluster and village of buildings didn't need any steeples to tell its mission to the world. Lots of our biggest meetin' houses need 'em bad to tell folks what they stand for. If it wuzn't for them steeples poor folks who wander into 'em out of their stifling alleys and dark courts wouldn't mistrust what they wuz for. They would see the elegantly dressed throng enter and pass over carpeted aisles into their luxuriously cushioned pews, and kneel down on soft hassocks and pray: "Thy kingdom come," and "Give us this day our daily bread," and "give us what we give others." These poor folks can't go nigh 'em, for the usher won't let 'em, but they meet 'em through the week, or hear of 'em, and know that they do all in their power to keep his kingdom of Love and Justice away from the world. They herd in their dark, filthy, death-cursed tenements, not fit for beasts, owned by the deacon of that church, and all the week run the gauntlet of those drink hells, open to catch all their hard-earned pennies, owned by the warden and vestrymen and upheld by the clergymen and them high in authority, and extolled as the Poor Man's Club. Wimmen who see their husbands enticed to spend all their money there and leave them and their children starving and naked; mothers who see their young boys in whom they tried to save a spark of their childish innocence, ground over in these mills of the devil into brutal ruffians who strike down the care-worn form of the one that bore them in agony, and bent over their cradle with a mother's love and hope. As they see all this, and know that this is the true meaning of the prayers put up in them elegant churches, don't they need steeples to tell that they're built to show Christ's love and justice to the world? Yes, indeed; they need steeples and high ones, too.

But this city of Robert Strong's didn't need steeples, as I say. It wuz Christianity built in bricks and mortar, practical religion lived right before 'em from day to day, comfortable houses for workmen, which they could hope to earn and call their own. Pleasant homes where happy love could dwell in content, because no danger stood round, hid in saloons to ruin husband, son and father; comfortable houses where health and happiness could dwell. Good wages, stiddy work, and a share in all the profits made there; good hard work whilst they did work, ensurin' success and prosperity; but short hours, ensurin' sunthin' beyond wages.

A big house, called a Pleasure House, stood in the centre of the broad, handsome streets, a sort of a centrepiece from which streams of happiness and health flowed through the hull city, some as them little rills of pure snow water flowed through the streets of Salt Lake and Denver. Where all sorts of innocent recreation could be found to suit all minds and ages. A big library full of books. A musuem full of the riches of science and art. A big music hall where lovers of music could find pleasure at any time, and where weekly concerts was given, most of the performers being of the musically inclined amongst the young people in the City of Justice. A pretty little theatre where they could act out little plays and dramas of a helpful, inspirin' sort. A big gymnasium full of the best appliances and latest helps to physical culture. A large bathing tank where the white marble steps led down to cool, sweet waters flowing through the crystal pool, free to all who wanted to use it. A free telephone linking the hull place together. I roamed along through the beautiful streets and looked on the happy, cheerful-faced workmen, who thronged them now, for their short day's work wuz ended and they wuz goin' home. My heart swelled almost to bustin' and I sez almost unbeknown to myself, to Robert Strong who wuz walkin' by my side: "We read about the New Jerusalem comin' down to earth, and if I didn't know, Robert Strong, that you had founded this city yourself, I should think that this wuz it."

"MISS MEECHIM INVITED ME IN"

He laughed his boyish laugh, but I see the deep meanin' in his clear, gray eyes and knew what he felt, though his words wuz light.

"Oh no," sez he, "we read that those gates are pearl; these are just common wood, turned out by my workmen."

Sez I, "The pearl of love and good will to man, the precious stun of practical religion and justice shines on these gates and every buildin' here, and I bless the Lord that I have ever lived to see what I have to-day." And I took out my snowy linen hankerchief and shed some tears on it, I was so affected.

Silver-lined Clouds

Although dark clouds in life appear,
Hope on! and do whate'er is right;
Thy Father's love is ever near,
And will shine out in darkest night.

For when the shower thickest falls
'T will surely soonest clear away;
For then the Father's voice oft calls
And summons forth a brighter day.

$5,000 More for Starving India

Direct Remittance, Forwarded by Cable to the American Missionaries, of Funds to be Used for Famine Relief . . . .

THERE is joy and gratitude this week in the stations of five missionaries in India. They are now rejoicing in the possession of five thousand dollars which has been cabled to them by the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to enable them to feed the starving people. It was necessary that money should be in the hands of the missionaries without delay. Experience has demonstrated that help rendered in the earl' weeks of an emergency of this kind is worth double that which has been sent after the pressure has been long continued. Not only may some lives be saved which cannot be saved later, but the missionaries need capital in hand with which to organize plans of employing the people, such as the digging of wells, the establishing of brick-yards, the purchase of yarn for weavers, etc. The contributions of our readers have not as yet aggregated five thousand dollars, but Dr. Klopsch believed that he might venture in the emergency to anticipate their gifts and to send the money by the swiftest method. The sum has been divided among the following missionaries who are in the most urgent need:

Rev. E. S. Hume, Bombay	$1,000
Rev. J. C. Lawson, Aligarh	1,000
Rev. M. B. Fuller, Gujerat	1,000
Rev. R. A. Hume, Ahmednagar	1,000
Pandita Ramabai, Khedgoan	1,000

All these are earnest Christian workers who will take a delight in relieving the destitute, and, having a long experience in India, know how to do it in the most efficient and economical way. All are Americans except Ramabai, and she, by long residence here and by her cordial friendships, may almost be reckoned one of ourselves. No one did more than she in the famine of 1897 to succor the afflicted. The memory of her own childhood, when she suffered the agonies of starvation, lent strength and energy to her and quickened her sympathies. The rough building she has erected at Khedgoan, in the Poona district, a picture of which appears on this page, is a haven of refuge for many a poor girl, who, but for Ramabai's thoughtfulness and care, might have died in the famine or have gone to a fate worse than death.

The latest news from India is ominous. On January 1st the Viceroy reported three million persons already on the relief works. This is a sure index of destitution, because the wages a man can earn there are only three cents a day, and the women can earn only two cents. People must be in sore straits before they will work for such pay. Yet in one district alone—that of Hissar—there are seventy thousand persons on the relief works, and thousands more are waiting to be employed. This fact in January is alarming, for in the corresponding month in the former famine the number was much smaller.

"Do Send Us Immediate Help" writes Mrs. J. C. Lawson, the American Methodist Episcopal missionary of Aligarh, in the Northwest Provinces. She continues: "The situation is dreadful. Whole villages are deserted, the inhabitants having gone to the cities in the hope of obtaining work. The extent of the famine is far greater than in that of three years ago. Many native States which escaped then are suffering now, and their people, knowing that their own government will do nothing for them, are crowding into the English States, where at least there are relief works. At our mission, finding it impossible to relieve all who come, we are limiting our efforts to the relief of widows and orphans. Already we have taken in sixty-seven destitute widows. Only God knows how we can support them; but we could not bear to see them die of starvation without trying to save them. In our house at Aligarh we have four hundred orphan boys and girls, whom we took in during the last famine. It is these that your readers are helping to support, and we have been greatly helped by your regular quarterly remittances. The boys are learning trades and the girls domestic work, and both are learning to read the Bible and to understand the principles of the Christian faith. Many of them are bright children whose rescue is a constant reason for thankfulness. We are now for widows in connection with these institutions. We can get an acre of land for about twenty dollars, and we shall need about five hundred dollars to build and equip quarters for three hundred women to live in. It will cost about fifteen dollars to support one of these widows a year.

"We found one widow, with two children—a girl of two years old and a bright little boy of six. She was trying to sell the girl for two rupees (about seventy-five cents). She had no food for them and believed they must die anyhow, but the price of the girl would enable her and the boy to live a little longer. We took all three into our house and the mother is a most grateful creature. Another woman with a family begged for admittance, but she has a sick husband and we were obliged to adhere to our rule of helping widows only. How we wish we could help all! But

and we have already spent fifty dollars, while all the help we have received so far is twelve dollars. If your readers could see the poor hungry creatures, especially the women and children, and could hear their thankful words for even one small meal, I believe they would willingly deny themselves some luxury or perhaps some comfort that some poor starving child might have food."

Such an appeal as this, following others already published, must surely touch every heart. Mrs. Lawson is right in believing that she will not appeal in vain to her countrymen and countrywomen in the sad emergency. She and the other American missionaries have been sent to India to preach Christ to the people, and we must enable them to show them, practically, how compassionate are the people who bear the name of Christ. They must not be placed in the situation James describes (James 2: 15. 16): "If a brother or sister be destitute of daily food and one of you say: Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body: what doth it profit? Even so faith, if it hath not works, is dead, being alone." The missionaries look to us for the means of proving to these people that faith is not dead. Let all who love the Lord Jesus Christ, all who remember his words: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto them ye did it unto me," send a contribution to this office that further help may be sent speedily to the afflicted people. ... Under the Evening Lamp ...

By Margaret E. Sangster

The Joy of Motherhood

THE first baby marks an era in a woman's life, and brings to her a flood of gladness which is like no other experience. It may well be that she knows little about taking care of her baby, and that the first blessed year of motherhood is beset with anxiety and made harder than it need be, for both mother and baby, because of her inexperience. Yet she may learn how to nurse her child, not whenever he cries, which was the old-fashioned way and caused many a colic, but by the clock, which is the new and sensible way; she may refrain from compressing the little body with tightly-pinned bands, and may dress the baby in a hygienic fashion; she may see that he is warm and comfortable, and above all, may care for him herself. Hired hands may relieve her, but she will personally look after the baby's welfare if she be a wise young mother. She will keep the baby in a quiet and tranquil world, a world of peace; and for his sake she will neither be fretted, nor cross, nor angry, nor unkind, since any evil passion or petty temper of hers will act as a malevolent poison in the milk in her breast. Baby's skies are mother's eyes, so that he will never have any but clear and sunny skies—if she love him in the right and true and motherly way—for him to see brooding over him.

One cannot but regret, looking at the innocent and beautiful infant in its mother's arms, that the duties of motherhood should ever be reluctantly assumed. It is the wife's crown of glory. Every little child which enters a home brings a whole train of benedictions with it. Yet there are women who unGraciously exclaim at their ill-fortune, when God sends them a little child; and who, perhaps in ignorance of the crime they commit, spend some of the first weeks of their sacred overshadowing in efforts to rid themselves of the precious gift. Surely no woman would do this if she stopped to consider how holy a thing is human life, and how honored is the mother in becoming the custodian of the new human being, in taking her share in carrying on the long history of the race. From the very first, in the prenatal days when as yet the secret is hers alone, her baby should be dear to the mother. When, after such pain and peril as only mothers know, her child lies in her arms, his welcome is assured. The wee morsel in the cradle is king of us all.

The baby sleeps—wonder of wonders! The baby nurses—bliss beyond compare! The baby sleeps! Let statesmen walk on tiptoe. The baby smiles! Heaven is not far from that home. The baby coos! Angels make no sweeter music.

I hope you sing to the baby, little mother; and hold him in your lap, and enjoy him and let other things go. He'll never be such a divinely beautiful rose-leaf of a darling again. Don't suffer people to kiss him or toss him up, or try to show him off, either now or by and by. Don't worry over his passing ailments; don't allow loud and sudden noises to come near him; don't let his proud young father walk the floor with him at night. He's a featherweight to-day, but he'll be a big and bouncing baby by and by, and it will be no joke to carry him for an hour at a time. Love him, love him—you can't love him too much! Pray for him every day by name. Begin calling him by name soon, for he is a little individual and deserves a name, and a very nice one.

BABY FAST ASLEEP

Winter Journeys

If obliged to travel in winter, be sure that your feet are properly protected. The warm, flannel-lined overshoes which button above the boot are indispensable in going to a colder climate than your own; and for use in a sleeping car at night you will need a thick and soft wrapper of outing flannel or of eiderdown, quilted in Japanese silk if you can afford it. Nothing more luxurious than the latter garment has yet been devised. A veil or a worsted nubia should be at hand for your head, unless you are provided with a knitted or quilted hood.

In going South, the requisites are not in the line of very warm clothing, and yet there are few places in our country where one does not need to fear an occasional cold snap. When it is cold in Florida, for instance, it is piercing while it lasts; though, fortunately, it seldom lasts long.

At the Attractive Dinner-table

Christmas is now several weeks behind us, but we are yet under its loving and genial spell, and our homes are warm and throbbing with the love of dear ones then made evident to us. At a Christmas dinner-table, in 1899 (we are in 1900 now, and 1899 seems already remote), the talk, which was breezy and animated, turned on creeds—why they are formulated, what evangelical Christians believe, what a man is pledged to when he unites with the Church, and what reservations certain people make. Every one was interested, and some were extremely positive in their statements, so that it began to seem desirable to the hostess to introduce a new subject and create a diversion. But somebody did it for her. The little blue-eyed granddaughter of the house, on whose golden head lies the sunshine of five happy years, piped up gravely and opportunely: "I know a boy who doesn't believe in Santa Claus!"

The wisdom of the baby was greater than she knew. Her remark was greeted with, so to speak, laughter and cheers. For everybody was very glad that she—bless her dear heart!—did believe in Santa Claus, and several people whose hair was silver averred that their belief in him had never yet waned. How could it, when the whole world was radiant in the light of his benignant countenance, and the spirit of good will was abroad in the earth?

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—ALICE. You have already laid your foundation, and you may become an accomplished Christian woman, if you choose. All education is not gained in the schoolroom.

—SOUTHERN MATRON. Your account of your Florida home makes me long to see it. I suppose oranges do taste much better when plucked from the trees, and the mocking-bird's song must be silvery and flute-like when you hear it in his native grove.

—JAMES. I cannot tell you how to make yourself attractive to women, except by saying that an honorable gentleman, who is invariably courteous and considerate, is sure to be pleasing. The best receipt for bashfulness is to stop thinking about yourself.

—MARTHA M. For pity's sake, dear friend, give up using morphia. You would far better suffer a great deal of pain; the use of this dangerous remedy will grow upon you insensibly, and before you are aware of it you will be its hapless and wellnigh hopeless slave.

—I ADVISE you to go to bed early, sleep in fresh air, and have an easy mind. You do not dream how much the mind can do in making the body beautiful. Health and beauty march together. Be well, if you can; and do avoid the indiscriminate use of drugs.

—JOHN D. While you live under your father's roof you must submit to his authority, in the matter of a latch-key. It does seem inconsiderate for you to stay out very late, when your father is obliged, by his resolution against the key, to sit up and let you in. Why not come home in good season?

—FROM an esteemed correspondent I receive another version of a child's evening prayer:

On reading page 492 of the CHRISTIAN HERALD, of December 6, 1899, where you say that "the old familiar 'Now I lay me,' should be on every child's lips at bedtime," it occurred to me that you might think the following modification appropriate. My child preferred it, others may:

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray thee, Lord, my soul to keep,
May holy angels 'round me stay,
And keep all evil far away;
Lord, help me peaceful rest to take,
And give me wisdom when I wake. Amen."

N. H. CLAFLIN, M.D.

FLOWERS IN THE WINDOW

THE snow is falling softly,
The hills and vales are white;
Wild winter spreads a mantle
On every field in sight.
But yet, it might be summer,
For bright and blooming gay
Are sister's window flowers,
Just like a morn in May.

Her primroses are blushing,
Her marguerites are fair,
Geranium and lily
And monthly rose are there.
In sister's window-garden
The flowers are smiling gay,
As if there were no winter,
But just a morn in May.

. . In Sudden Heat . .

IN sudden and violent anger, a young man of nineteen killed his father. The latter was drunk and abusive, following up a curse of wrathful language, by a blow of his fist in his son's face. The boy, transported with rage, seized a knife—for the altercation happened at the family table, and on Christmas, of all days!—and fatally stabbed his father. No provocation can excuse his act, but, only think of the sermon it is on two themes: one, the use of intoxicants, which changes a happy home into a daily hell; the other, the folly and wickedness of an unrestrained temper. To the day of his death, this young man, even if excused from punishment by the law—as he probably will be—will carry with him the bitter memory of parricide. His mother, his brother and himself must bear a load of grief and shame.

When we are bringing up our sons, we mothers must be vigilant that we control our passions, our tongues, our very tones; and equally we should teach them the constant exercise of forbearance and the gentlest love in combat with every furious impulse. Our hasty words and our impetuous acts may bear fruit of the Dead Sea, to poison every remaining hour upon earth; but, if we are too weak to gain the victory for ourselves or our children in our own strength, we may always gain it by prayer at the foot of the Throne. Let us seek for ourselves and our children daily realization of the beauty and strength of gentleness. Teach the children by example that there is dignity in silence or in restrained speech under provocation.

Patchwork

A dear reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, seventy-one years old, is making, in varied and beautiful patterns, her one hundred and fourth quilt. Among my prized Christmas gifts a year ago, was a silk quilt, made in a very beautiful style, by a friend who had passed her eightieth birthday. The stitches were as fine and as regular as though they had been set by youthful fingers.

One thing we may do for old friends who enjoy making patchwork, is to save our pieces for them. When we have a new gown, let us keep a remnant for some one who can utilize it in this way, and if we have in our home a dear aunt or grandmother whose little basket with its spools stands in some familiar corner, let us take an interest in her work.

Bearing Malice

To bear malice or evil about in our hearts, to take opportunities of saying unkind things and to descant on the follies and mistakes of our acquaintances, are mean and small employments. Of a very sweet woman it was said the other day: "Miss L—— never says anything unkindly critical. If she is forced to disapproval, she is silent. The law of kindness is on her lips." I think such a testimony is very beautiful, indeed.

THE TOUCHSTONE

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

CHAPTER XII.

A Subtle Temptation

FOR some reason of her own Mrs. Locke seemed bent on bringing Celia and Douglas together. After the children had finished their games and had given cheers for Mr. Allardyce and Miss Celia, and had been sent to their homes, Mrs. Locke remembered that she would need an escort and asked Martin Hamerton to fill that office. This of course left Douglas to walk home with Celia. On their way Douglas told his companion about Mr. Allardyce's illness.

"I was afraid that he was ill again," she said regretfully. "I am very sorry. Though we laugh at Mr. Allardyce sometimes, I am really very fond of him. And it seems so sad: he has worked so hard to earn his money and his position, and a little quiet time to enjoy it all; and now this has come, to make him feel that he only holds it from day to day."

"There are many different ways in which a man has notice to get up and move on," said Douglas very soberly. "I suppose if we did not get a peep behind the scenes now and then, we might be too much inclined to envy a man like Mr. Allardyce——"

"Not you, surely! You who are young and have all the world before you? I did not think a young man would ever envy one who had had his day, even if he might hope to enjoy the evening of it in peace."

"Not altogether, perhaps. But even at my age one has found out that it does not mean much to have the world before one—not so much as to have one little corner of it for one's very own, and friends to whom one belongs, as a matter of course. A man's home is the only thing I should ever think of envying him, and if a home is not to be gained before threescore and ten——"

"A smaller home than Sudbrook Hall might be attainable earlier," said the girl, without a hidden thought to make her hesitate. "And friends may be picked up on the way, may they not?"

"I hope so. But it is the curse of a homeless, 'relationless' man that he knows that he cannot possibly be as much to his friends as his friends are to him. And that makes him distrustful and down-hearted."

Celia did not quite know how to answer this impersonally-worded plaint. She quickened her steps half unconsciously, and they came a little nearer to Mrs. Locke and Martin, who were walking briskly and apparently talking very confidentially. Douglas eyed the backs of their heads, inclined one towards another, and the sight seemed to move him to a sort of half confidence.

"Miss Celia," he began abruptly—"I may call you that, mayn't I? No one calls you Miss Hamerton, and every village child may say 'our Miss Ceelie'—I want to ask you something," he hurried on, giving her no time to demur. "I haven't known you long, but your great kindness, and your brother's, makes me feel as though you were old friends. Anyway, I have none that it would hurt me so much to lose. I want you to promise me, if any one talks to you, if you hear things said against me, that you will not condemn me unheard. Don't grow cold to me and drop me and leave me to wonder why! Give me a fair hearing, and let me tell my own story; and you shall judge between them."

It would have seemed natural if Celia had asked who the young man suspected of intending to speak against him, but she did not.

"I don't think either Martin or I would be ready to condemn any one unheard," she answered gravely.

"I am putting it badly enough!" said Douglas, with some passion. "It sounds as though I had a bad conscience—as though I had some reason to expect an accusation to be made against me; but I have not! I have nothing to boast of, but there is no reason why I should not be your brother's friend, or even yours. I seem suspicious—crazy, I daresay—but I can't help it! I have lost one dear friend, and I think I shall never know why. I must make a fight for those I have left."

He seemed to himself to be talking in riddles; but Celia understood him better than he could have hoped, thinking of that letter which even now she dared not tell him that she had seen.

"I don't cast off my friends without good reason given and proved up to the hilt," she said, "and I will answer for Martin that he does not do so either."

"But am I your friend? Will you forgive my boldness, and let me count myself your friend?" he urged.

"If you wish," answered Celia; and as Douglas held out an imploring hand, she laid hers for an instant in it.

Their paction had not been made too soon, for in a moment or two they reached the cottage where Mrs. Locke had rooms, and she must exchange gracious adieux with them all, and final comments upon the fineness of the afternoon and the perfection of all the arrangements.

From thence to the Dower House was but a short distance, and Martin naturally joined his sister and his friend, and the two discussed Mr. Allardyce's illness, and the likelihood that the doctor would order him away, since there would be no quiet to be had for him in the neighborhood till the election was over.

Arrived at the Dower House gate, Martin hospitably pressed Douglas to come in and finish the evening with them, but he declined, saying that he would rather come on another evening soon, and ignoring a suggestion that he might just as well do both. Somehow Celia divined that he was still too much moved to be in the humor for lamplight and ordinary talk, and her eyes followed him a little wistfully as he went up the dusky lane alone.

But she turned brightly enough upon Martin when they were in the house. The smile on his lips lasted only till his sister was gone, and then he suddenly grew grave, and seemed at once to forget his surroundings and the things in which he and Celia had a common interest.

He sat down and took out of a drawer a large flat parcel with a publisher's label on it, which had been brought to him by the post that morning.

Martin Hamerton did not open it—what author needs or wishes to open a packet of rejected MSS.?—but he sat looking at it as if its return meant something more than the ordinary pains and mortifications of would-be authorship.

Every man has his problems to solve, and while Martin was grappling with his, Douglas was wrestling with another peculiarly his own. It seemed to him that his friendship for Celia had assumed a new shape in that walk homeward during which he had obtained a definite pledge of friendship from her, and she was not a girl to make such a promise and mean nothing by it.

You Can Play Them Without Learning

NEW YORK CHURCH CHOIR ZOBO BAND

This band has been organized over a year by the members of the M. E. Church Choir and Organist, (Mr. C Diehl) of 123d St. M. E. Church, New York City, as a means of raising money for Church and Missionary purposes; and has given many successful and astonishingly profitable concerts. They find it a pleasant, profitable variation from routine work, especially valuable in concerts, and of great use in church services. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands, and find them of great value; if a Church or society desires to make money, let them give a Zobo Concert, as they invariably draw full houses.

READ WHAT PASTORS AND ORGANISTS SAY ABOUT OUR INSTRUMENTS

Rev. H. E. Berkey, of Red Lion, Pa., says: "My Sunday School Superintendent, Mr. J. A. Miller, has called my attention to your Zobo Band Instruments, as he has some, and thinks they are just suited for our work." Mrs. Hattie E. Konnty, of Springfield, S. Dak., organist, choir leader, says: "Zobo instruments received, and are all right and we want more of them." Rev. James C. Mitchell, of North Easton, N. J., says: "I have just received the Zobo Cornet and I am delighted with it, will organize a band." Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I find the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first-class, and just what we needed, as we have a very small organ. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Cornet, and would say it was a complete success." Mae Blance Winfield, instructor of music at Gallaway Female College, of Searcy, Ark., says: "I am much pleased with the Zobo Band Instruments, I could not and would not do without them, either in my Orchestra or in my Clubs, as they give much beauty and volume to the orchestral parts" (This orchestra plays only high class music). Also refer you to Rev. A. G. Stewart of Raymond, S. Dak.; Rev. C. McKibbin, of East Grand Forks, Minn.; Rev. W. H. Sampson, of St. John, New Brunswick, Canada; Rev. A. S. Willoughby, of Moorland, Ia. Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from renowned persons who have had our goods, but we believe we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

CAN BE PLAYED BY ANY ONE WHO CAN HUM A TUNE—NO LEARNING

We do away with that long tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced. It seems impossible for it to accomplish so much. An instrument capable of almost every modulation its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove or the thrilling song of the nightingale.

ORGANISTS, VOCALISTS AND MUSICAL DIRECTORS

These instruments open up new possibilities to the vocalists, as music written especially for instrumentation may be rendered with brilliant effect, and a good voice is not necessary. They develop the vocal chords. SING INTO MOUTHPIECE—ZOBO DOES THE REST. The cornet is an elegant accompaniment to Organ, Piano or any string instrument, and affords unlimited pleasure to the individual; suited for all in and outdoor entertainment.

With a Full Band a Grand Pipe Organ Effect Can be Obtained

Those that have no pipe organ, the Zobo supplies the want at a minimum cost; every church without a paid choir should organize a Zobo Church Choir Band. Zobo bands can play any piece of music (all parts) by ear or by note as preferred.

SPECIAL OFFER To introduce the musical marvel of the age, we will send Zobo Cornet, 12 inches long, 6 inch bell; Alto Cornet, 15 inches long, 6 inch bell; Bass Horn, 21 inches long, 9 inch bell; Slide Trombone, horn, 17 inches long, 7 inch bell, slide one-half inch brass tubing, 24 inches long, closed with a 10 inch extension slide, and Zobo Book of Music and Instructor, complete for $15.00. The outfit consists of 4 (4 instruments) Solid Brass Instruments, highly polished, sweet toned, that is capable of producing really high-grade music. If, however, you have any doubt as to our claims for these instruments, we will send you the Zobo Cornet and illustrated catalogue, with full instruction "how to play," by mail for $1.00 postpaid. This is a grand offer and you should not miss it. Send money by registered letter, postoffice money order, a bank draft payable to our order, or have your storekeeper order for you. We have just been awarded First Prize, Gold Medal, at the Greater American Exposition, Omaha, Neb. the judges of the same consisted of three of the most prominent Piano, Organ and Musical Instrument Manufacturers in this country, which speaks volumes for our instrument.

Neither, on the other hand, was she the kind of girl to allow love-making under the guise of friendship. It was a step forward, certainly, but not altogether in the right direction.

And it seemed to him, also, that he had put himself definitely in opposition to Caryl, that he had seen in his brother's look and manner a tolerably legible assurance that what he wanted, Caryl wanted also.

Men very rarely understand to what extent a girl chooses for herself. At the bottom of their hearts they mostly believe that he who presses in most boldly will carry her off: and, indeed, events do very often seem to bear them out in this belief. So, that an unselfish lover, even if he be also a modest man, will seriously consider whether it would not be for his lady's advantage that he should hold back and let another man take her (much as though she were a tourney prize that must needs go to the winner), and never glances at the possibility that she may not choose to be won by either.

In other circumstances, Douglas would have been quite capable of thinking that he ought to efface himself to insure Caryl's happiness, and to give Celia a wealthier husband than he himself was ever likely to be. But as things were he could not feel that he owed Caryl anything, nor would he insult Celia by supposing that money would weigh with her.

He was thinking of these things as he walked home from work, on the day after the school-feast. There were very few waking hours, except when he was professionally employed, when he was not thinking of them. As he reached the turn in the road where he had once met Mrs. Locke, to his surprise he saw her there again; and this time she made no secret of the fact that she had been waiting to intercept him.

"I knew you would be anxious to hear about Mr. Allardyce," she said, "so after I had been up to the Hall to ask after him, I walked 'round this way to meet you."

"It was very good of you. And how is he?"

"Well, he won't own to being ill—he never does, I believe, after one of these attacks. But he is not looking at all as well as usual, and the doctor has absolutely forbidden any excitement. He is to go away somewhere to-morrow, out of hearing of all news, until the election is over. Frank is to take him, and, I believe, they are not to leave any address, for fear of friends or foes pestering him with telegrams."

"That seems rather a strong measure, but I can quite believe that he excites himself a great deal more than is necessary."

"Oh yes! but I think it is foolish of the doctor, all the same. He will only fret himself more at not being allowed to hear anything. And I can't think what he will do without Caryl—he has come to depend so upon Caryl for everything; Frank can do nothing to please him."

"The question seems rather, at the present time, what will Caryl do without him?" said Douglas somewhat dryly.

"Oh, he has done all he can, and the election should be pretty safe, I should think. After all, it is his purse rather than his head that is wanted."

After this remark both fell silent until Mrs. Locke asked casually, "What do you think of Caryl's house?"

"Caryl's house! Which is that?"

"Oh, hasn't he told you? You know that nice house on the Castleford Road, with the large garden and the bay windows? If he is elected—we must not be so disloyal as to doubt it—he means to rent that house, which is to let furnished."

"Rather a large place for a bachelor!"

"Yes, but there is no reason why Caryl should remain a bachelor, and—I don't think he intends to."

"Cousin Dora's" talks had always been full of pin-pricks, but this was more than a prick with a pin; it felt more like a dagger, and that a poisoned one.

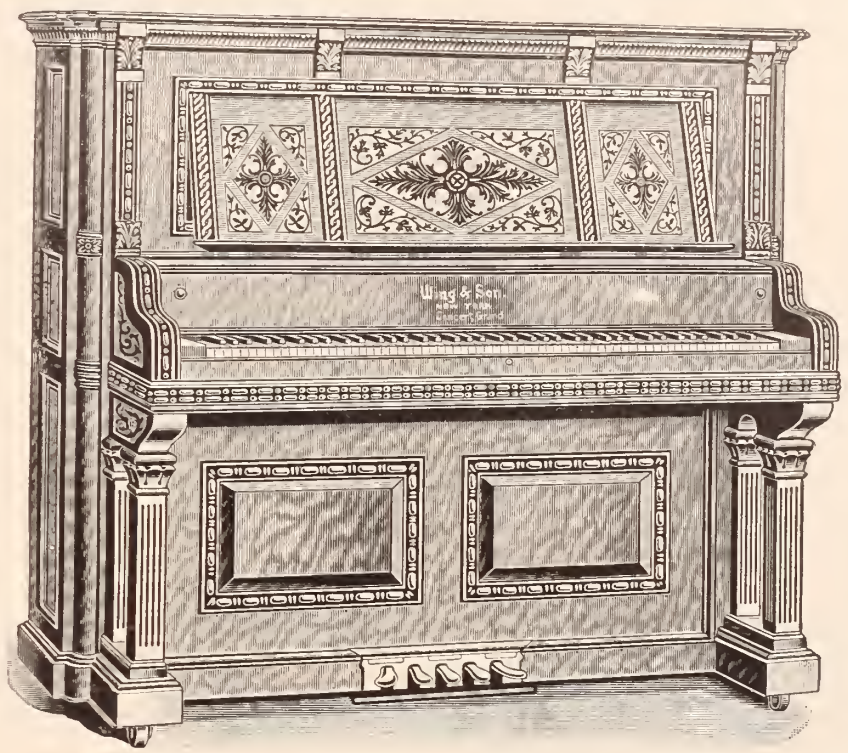
Full metal plate, with metal depression bar and metal supports for key bed. Improved noiseless direct motion pedal action. Improved practice attachment. Full length duet music desk. Carved panels. Instrumental attachment.



The usual way to buy a piano is from a retail agent or dealer. We do not sell our pianos in this way, but supply our pianos direct from our factory to retail purchasers. There are a great many advantages in buying direct from the factory. The most important is the saving in price. We do not employ a single salesman or agent, and we have no salesroom except our factory. We transact all of our business and ship all pianos direct from our factory and our expenses are small, and as we sell a much larger number of pianos than any dealer or retail firm, a very small profit pays us.

No matter how far away you live, our improved system of doing business makes it actually more convenient and more satisfactory to buy a piano from us than to buy one from a local dealer in your own town or city. Write us and receive full particulars.

We sell the Wing Piano on easy terms of payment and take old instruments in exchange.

Watch-night at the Bowery Mission

Over Two Hundred Men Begin the New Year by Accepting Christ

AS December 31st fell on a Sunday, the Bowery Mission Watch-night Service received a splendid impetus from Mrs. Bird's Sunday morning meeting. Not only was the latter one of the largest meetings ever held in the Mission, but it had prepared the men's minds and hearts for the extraordinary scenes of the evening. In the morning meeting the Superintendent announced that every man who attended the evening service would do so on the condition that he would be prepared to be dealt with personally about his soul.

In the evening, for three hours, came a stream of testimony from the lips of redeemed men, interspersed by songs and quartettes of exceptionally sweet and effective character. Among the men who sung and testified were no less than three ex-opera singers, all of whom have been saved through the instrumentality of the Bowery Mission.

Wonderfully diversified were the testimonies. Two old men sat side by side. One had in former years occupied a most influential position in our Federal offices at Washington; the other a prominent physician in a neighboring city. Both had been the victims of drink, and had lost position, friends, home—everything; both had eventually drifted to the Bowery, had been drawn into the Mission, and had found Christ. A man standing in the crowd near the door, tells of his conversion twelve months ago. "I was worn out," he says; "I had not slept in a bed for nine months. Now I have a good position and a happy home." Following him is a bright little man near the platform who served four and a half years in Sing Sing for killing a man in a drunken Bowery brawl. His words are few, but so hearty and so impressive. Then rises a gentlemanly man in the front who is now a prosperous tradesman, but who a few years ago lived on pickings from the ash barrels in the streets. Then a tall longshoreman rises, and every ear is eager to hear his story. He is the man with the soldierly bearing and the tender voice, with the touching story of an eighteen years' life in sin and drunkenness, of separation from wife and child, of entering the Mission because he was famishing with hunger and wanted something to eat; and when he tells the tale, strong men lay their heads on their arms and sob like children. He has a place in the aisle to-night; he is a leader in one of the "sections," and his testimony is given from the rear of the room, but his voice rings out clearly, and every man hears the wonderful story.

"It was a kind word that saved me," says one. "Every door was closed against me," says another. "Home was so lonely when father and mother died," is uttered in a quivering voice by another. "My little girl was the means of bringing me here," says another.

When all the testimonies had been given, the little army of devoted workers stood in front of the platform, and the blessed work of seeking out the individual began in earnest. At 11.30 the meeting was called to order. There was no room for a penitent form. In the evening the whole building was an altar. When all was quiet, however, we asked the men who were fully determined to commence the New Year in the new life in Christ to rise to their feet, charging them in God's sight not to rise unless they were absolutely sincere. The workers stood in the aisles, with their eyes upon the individuals with whom they had been dealing, and when the count was made it was found that 216 men had made the great and momentous decision.

At a quarter before twelve, with every head bowed, we entered into a season of silent prayer. At the last stroke of midnight the mission organ pealed out the "Old Hundred," every man was on his feet, and the building rang with the song:

Praise God from whom all blessings flow.

SHE QUIT COFFEE

And Got Well with the Help of Postum Food Coffee

I am a school girl and want to tell you what Postum Food Coffee has done for me and several of my relatives.

The old-fashioned coffee always made me heavy and dull and gave me heartburn, with dyspepsia. When we tried Postum Food Coffee, it did not taste good, but I begged for another trial. when the directions were followed, and we found it delicious. Since that time, we have used it regularly, and I never have any trouble with the heavy feeling or dyspepsia.

Dr. Lowrie prescribed Postum for my uncle, Mr. ———, property man of the Boston Theatre, and it worked a marvelous change in him. He quit the common coffee, and has been using Postum Food Coffee ever since. He looks better than he ever did before. His family also use it. Uncle is very strong in his praise of Postum for the good it has done him. Please do not use my signature, but you can use the statement." ———, Worcester, Mass. Porto Rico Relief Work

THE first week of New Year marked three movements looking to the prosperous establishment of Porto Rico. The introduction in Congress of the Faraher bill, providing for the self-government of the island; the movement originating with the Porto Ricans themselves and resulting in the sending of a native delegation, representing the sugar, coffee and other interests of the island, to urge upon Congress measures for the improvement of the agricultural situation; also for adjustment of trade relations; the third movement is involved in the action of the Merchants' Association which invited representatives of Commercial bodies in all our large cities to join a large delegation of prominent Americans who propose investigating, by personal visit, the manufacturing possibilities of the island. General Davis, the military governor of Porto Rico, arrived in this country in the first week of the year, his mission being the representation in Washington of Porto Rico's needs. He reports the people as peaceable, as appreciative of the educational advantages which have been provided for them, and eager for the establishment of settled trade relations.

Since last acknowledgment, the following contributions in aid of the Porto Rican Relief Fund have been received:

Abbey's Effervescent Salt

("THE 'SALT' OF SALTS")

is composed of fruit acids and saline ingredients forming a beautiful, evenly granulated, effervescent tonic laxative of delightful acid flavor. It is so pleasant to the taste that even children take it eagerly.

It will prevent and relieve Constipation, Indigestion, Headache, Biliousness, Rheumatism, Gout, Fevers, Nervous Depression, Skin, Kidney and Liver Complaints. It purifies the blood and clears the complexion.

There are some people who never do anything until they have to. Don't be one of them. Take care of your health while you have it. The daily use of Abbey's Salt will keep you in good health the year 'round by keeping your stomach, liver and bowels in perfect condition.

It is endorsed by the leading physicians of America and Europe.

"Our artificial mode of life constantly causes such changes to take place in the quality of the blood, that it frequently becomes impure and we fall an easy prey to infectious diseases and blood disorders of all kinds. I strongly advocate keeping the system cool and the blood pure, and I know of no better remedy than your Abbey's Effervescent Salt. I take it every morning before my bath and I can assure you as a fact that I should miss it more than my breakfast. Most aperients (the German Waters, etc.) have a depressing effect. Your Abbey's Effervescent Salt is invigorating, cleans the tongue and mouth and imparts a feeling of freshness and energy to the entire system. I am constantly prescribing it."—Dr W. H. WRIGHT, L.R.C.P.I., L.M., M.R.C.S.E., L.S.A.I., Medical Officer of Health, London, England.

"I am glad to say I find Abbey's Salt an excellent laxative and ant-acid. It gives good results in various forms of Dyspepsia and in Constipation. I have always thought that the effervescent salines were not half as well known and used in this country as they ought to be."—Dr. N. B. SIZER, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Abbey's Salt is put up in three sizes; the 25-cent size is the usual trial size; the 50-cent size will cure a severe case of Dyspepsia or Constipation, while the $1.00 size is purchased by those who have learned of the benefits to be derived by the daily use of this excellent preparation.

Abbey's Salt is English and was introduced into the United States last spring. It is sold in DRUG STORES only in many cities and towns, but if your druggist has not got it yet we will mail any size, postpaid, on receipt of price of same.

FREE Send two 2-ct stamps, to pay postage and packing, and we will mail you one of the most dainty and beautiful colored calendar creations of the year.

A BRAWNY SCOT

Eggs and Grape-Nuts

"I would like to give you my experience since using Grape-Nuts ten weeks. I began weighing 175 pounds with a big stomach owing to improper digestion.

I now weigh 199 pounds, and the flesh is on the right places, i. e., the entire muscular anatomy.

Before trying Grape-Nuts I looked upon the food as a Yankee dodge to fleece the public. (I am Scotch.) I am glad to admit my mistake. I stir two raw eggs in one-half cup Grape-Nuts, sugar to taste, beat all together two minutes, add boiling water, one-half cup; let stand two minutes, and you have a dish that would satisfy the Prince of Wales for once in his life anyhow. I have a delicate sister in Edinburgh, Scotland, who wants Grape-Nuts. Can she get them there?" John W. Hunter, Oakland, California.

F. J. Lawrence, of 435 Fourth Ave., Detroit, Mich., exchange editor on the Evening News, says: "I never really broke down while at this work, but one time I was in such a condition that my physician said I would have nervous prostration. I was in a bad way, my nerves seemed to give out and I could not sleep. I lost flesh and had a complication of ailments which baffled skilful medical treatment.

One of my associates recommended Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People and I gave them a trial. The pills gave me strength and helped my shattered nerves so that I could get a full night's rest. Soon after I began taking them regularly, the pain ceased, causing me to feel like a new man."

From the Evening News, Detroit, Mich.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are never sold by the dozen or hundred, but always in packages. At all druggists, or direct from the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., 50 cents per box, 6 boxes $2.50.

The First Resurrection

Its Place in the Millennial Kingdom and the Persons who will Participate in it

BY BISHOP DAHLE, OF NORWAY*

THE events which group themselves under the title "The Millennial Kingdom" are mainly three: the binding of the devil, the first resurrection, and the Millennium itself, of which the first and second prepare for the third, and are conditions of its coming.

Both by the prophet Daniel and by the apostle Paul it is clearly enough hinted that it is the coming of the Lord in person that will destroy Antichrist.

John sees thrones set up: "They sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them" (Rev. 20: 4). Who are they who sat upon these thrones? and in what sense is it said of them that judgment was given unto them? The judgment which is held cannot be the Last Judgment. We must, therefore, look about for some other explanation. It has been supposed, and probably justly, that the solution will be found in the double meaning of the word "judge." For the word in Scripture means sometimes to pass a judgment, sometimes to rule, to exercise royal power.

If the word is regarded in this latter sense, all difficulties on this point disappear. The apostle then sees a great host, those who are permitted to share in the dominion with Christ. Nor is it necessary to ask over whom they will then rule; for after the Last Judgment the elect will rule with Christ to all eternity, although there may be no reference to any who will be governed by them, or any "subjects" in heaven over whom they will rule. It merely denotes that they enjoy a glory, power, and honor with God that can only be compared with a king's.

And so far as concerns "the resurrection from the dead," the whole trend of the apostle's argument leads the thought to "the resurrection of the just."

A noteworthy passage is I. Cor. 15: 23, 24: "Christ the firstfruits; after that they that are Christ's at his coming. Then cometh the end," etc. This seems to include all true Christians, both those who are dead when he comes and they who are still alive, and who will be changed when the trumpet sounds. This can only be "the resurrection of the just," and in that all will participate who really belong to the Lord when he comes. What else can he here mean but sharing in "the resurrection of the just"; in other words, being saved?

It seems, therefore, as if Paul had known of the double resurrection, mentioned in the Revelation, and regarded it as certain that all believers will participate in the first. Of the interval between the two (or, as Paul puts it, between the resurrection of those who "are Christ's at his coming" and "the end"), which in the Revelation is filled up by the millennial kingdom, he does not speak further.

With this passage we may connect I. Thess. 4: 13-17. What the apostle here wishes to show is that those already dead at the Lord's coming will not miss any of the honor and glory which believers then alive will enjoy; both will have the same advantages. When the Lord comes and the trumpet sounds, "the dead in Christ" will first arise, then the living believers will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord, and all ever be with the Lord. Here we learn that all they who belong to the Lord will be gathered to him when he comes. There is no mention here of the resurrection of the ungodly, nor even of a judgment. Is this not due to the fact that the time for these two events has not yet arrived? They will first come to pass after the "thousand years." But the judgment which then follows has no significance for those already saved and glorified. It will be no real interruption of their life in glory, and so the apostle can close by saying that now they will henceforth ever be with the Lord.

According to these clear indications in the Word of God, we must assume that all true believers, dead or alive, at the Lord's return for judgment upon Antichrist, will participate in the first resurrection.

Social Needs.

Whatever questions of Social Needs may exist, and however much we may rack our brains to discover satisfactory solutions of them, there is at least one—and certainly not the least important—province, in which the solution has been found. For is not the question "What is our best daily beverage?" of importance to all classes of society? And is any other answer to that question possible, from disinterested persons, than Van Houten's Cocoa? It is more wholesome than any other drink, it is nourishing and easy to digest; refreshing, without acting injuriously on the nervous system, in the way that Tea, Coffee, and other drinks do; and its delicious flavor in no way palls on the taste after continually using the cocoa. As regards its price, it is, as thousands can testify from practical experience, not at all dear to use.

What a pity all social questions cannot be answered as easily as the above one; but their answers require a great deal of thinking about. Those who are busy thinking about them, cannot do better than take a cup of Van Houten's Cocoa daily, as for helping the brain-worker it is without equal.

BE SURE YOU TRY VAN HOUTEN'S Eating CHOCOLATE.

The Lesson to Simon

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Jan. 28. Luke 7: 36-50

AT first sight, the parable of the two debtors does not appear to apply to "the woman who was a sinner." They loved, the one more and the other less, because they had been forgiven, while she appears to have been forgiven because she loved much. Thus, from the narrative, standing alone, it would appear that the one case was the converse of the other. It is, however, legitimate to assume that Luke does not tell the whole of the story. This could not have been the first time that the woman had seen our Lord. At least, if she had not seen him before, she must have heard of him and have formed an estimate of his character. Such a woman, pursuing her ordinary life, would not have gone uninvited to Simon's house that she might see and hear a religious teacher. Still less is it probable that she would have taken her box of precious ointment to anoint the feet of a stranger. She must have heard his words, compassionate of sinners, his encouragement to wanderers to repent and return, his assurances of pardon for the outcast, or have heard of them. She had already become repentant and went into the house, with a heart overflowing with love to Him who had begun a new life in her soul.

Simon was doubtless in an inquiring state of mind. He was not sure about this young Teacher. He would not reject him off-hand, as so many of his school did. He would give him a hearing and judge for himself. So he invites him to dinner, but he does not treat him as an honored guest. He omits the usual courtesies that a host paid to an equal or a superior, and doubtless thought the young Galilean sufficiently honored by being invited to the house of a Pharisee. Jesus accepted, as he appears to have accepted any invitation that promised opportunities of teaching; and at the outset made no remark upon the slight put upon him. Simon was in a critical mood and when he saw the woman's attentions accepted, he had the clue for which he was looking. He had no interest in the woman, no concern about the remarkable exhibition of unexpected softening that she made, but only in the indication he thought it afforded of Christ's lack of perception. A real prophet would not, he thought, have accepted such attentions from a woman of bad character, and therefore he assumed that Jesus must be accepting them in ignorance of her character; which proved that he had not the penetration characteristic of a true prophet. But Christ shows him by his parable that he not only knew the character of the woman, but also knew the thoughts that were passing in Simon's mind.

Christ's story of the two debtors showed Simon that he perfectly understood the situation. The woman's demonstration was not one of hysterical emotion, but an evidence of repentance and deep-seated reverence for himself. There was a cause for it. She had become a new creature, had passed from death unto life. That new life she owed to him, and nothing that she could give or do to show her gratitude, was too great. She was not forgiven because of her tears, or because of her anointing his feet; but the tears and the anointing were a consequence or result of her gratitude. Her faith had saved her, and now faith had produced love. If Simon had put faith in him and had been forgiven, it would not have been left to the woman to wash Christ's feet and anoint them. Simon had neither the faith nor the love that the woman had, nor had he the sense of his sin and the need of its forgiveness that she had. Christ showed that he was not indifferent to affection. As with Mary of Bethlehem, who made a like demonstration of love (John 12: 3), he defended her from the reproofs of those who condemned her. It is not possible to show affection in that way now, but Christ has his representatives in the poor and the afflicted and accepts service rendered to them, for love of him, as service rendered to himself.

IN the play of MACBETH, Shakespeare makes Banquo demand of the witches,

"If you can look into the SEEDS OF TIME,
And say which grain will grow, and which will not,
Speak then to me, who neither beg nor fear
Your favours nor your hate."

Had Banquo lived in the year 1900, he would need no witch to tell him which seeds will grow. He would just take down his Burpee Farm Annual and make out his list. Banquo's garden in the spring would then make the mouth of an anchorite water and turn his neighbors green with envy.

RELIEF FROM RHEUMATICS..

Mr. W. H. Jenkins writes from Topeka, Kan., under date of August 5th, 1898:

GENTS: Several years ago I was crippled with rheumatism, and for 162 weeks I was unable to do business of any kind, and in that time I have expended nearly $3,000. I had given up all hope.

My mother in looking over the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE saw your advertisement, and we ordered one bottle of your Tartarlithine, which gave me immediate relief.

I have recommended your medicine to a number of parties in this city, who have had chronic rheumatism for years. One of them, a lady 68 years of age, is now doing her own work. So far your medicine has not failed to make a cure.

In conclusion your medicine is just as represented, and has entirely eliminated the disease from my body. My mother is enthusiastic over the benefits that I have derived from the use of your medicine.

RIVER SCENES AT MAYWOOD COLONY NO. 20.

ORCHARDS ON MAYWOOD COLONIES NOS. 1 AND 2.

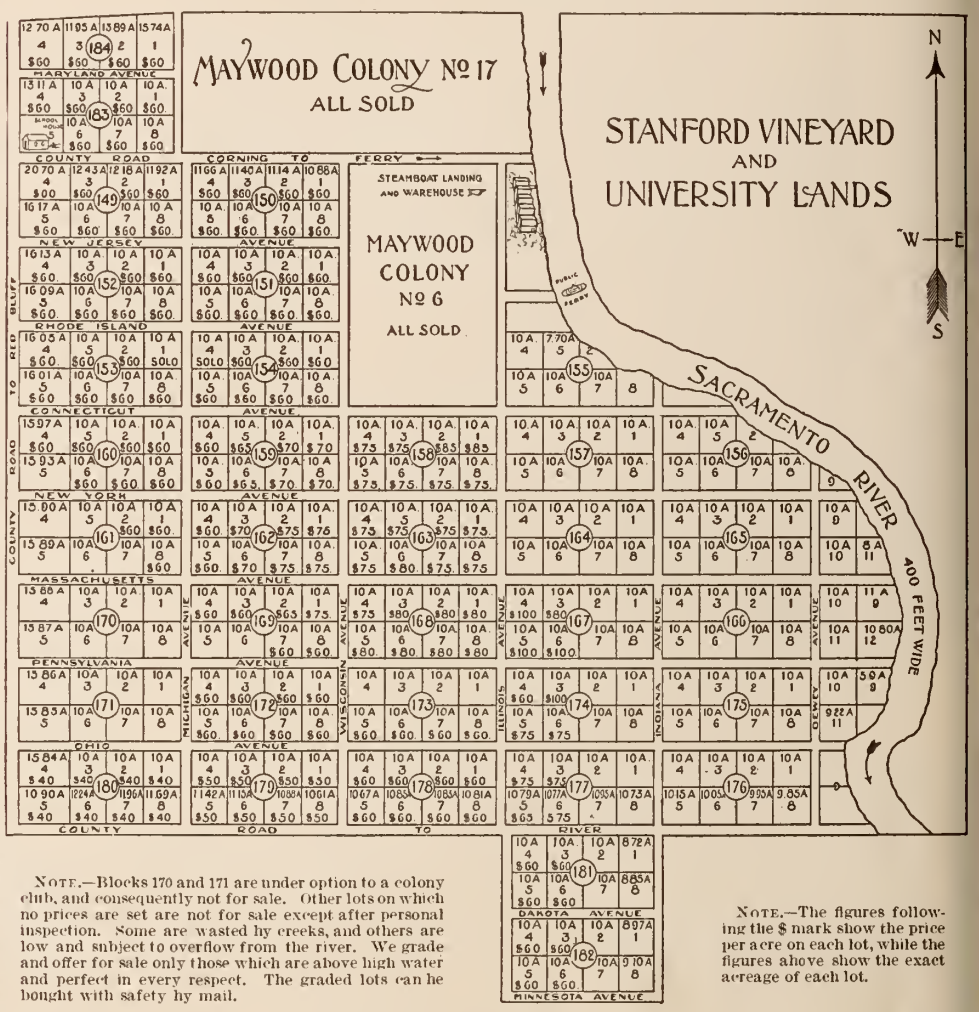
Homes for Hundreds

—IN—

Maywood Colony (No. 20) California.

IN presenting to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this, our 20th contiguous subdivision of fruit land, we offer what is, in many ways, the cream of our Colonies. Maywood Colony No. 20 comprises 3,078 acres of fertile fruit and garden land. The orange, lemon, olive, fig, grape, peach, pear, prune, apricot, and almond, as well as melons, vegetables, and alfalfa, will thrive to perfection on this soil. In addition to being excellent in quality, it is beautiful in landscape. Land is from level to gently rolling, with huge oak trees here and there, many of which have a spread of foliage of 100 or more feet. A house built under one of these trees becomes at once a home.

This Colony lies exactly three miles east of Corning and the railway; three miles north of the village of Kirkwood, and three miles west of Vina, the town and station on the Stanford Estate. This shows the location to be all that could be desired. A public school stands on lot five of block 183. Another will be built more centrally when colonists settle there. Steamboats land at the warehouses shown on accompanying plot. The ferry connecting Colony 20 with the Stanford vineyard belongs to the county, and is free. Title to lots in this Colony, as in the case of our 19 preceding tracts, is absolutely perfect. Our Advocate, No. 23, tells all about Maywood Colony No. 20. Get it.



NOTE.—Blocks 170 and 171 are under option to a colony club, and consequently not for sale. Other lots on which no prices are set are not for sale except after personal inspection. Some are wasted by creeks, and others are low and subject to overflow from the river. We grade and offer for sale only those which are above high water and perfect in every respect. The graded lots can be bought with safety by mail.

NOTE.—The figures following the $ mark show the price per acre on each lot, while the figures above show the exact acreage of each lot.

No Interest. We Pay Taxes While Payments Are Being Made.

CASH TERMS.

A straight and uniform discount of $10.00 an acre on all grades of land in Colony 20 is allowed on cash sales.

SPECIAL TERMS.

If desired, we will accept a third or half payment, allowing balance to run for two years with interest at eight per cent. a year, out of which we pay the taxes.

One-quarter and one-half lots can be had at same price per acre and proportionate payments.

If you want some of this land, don't delay. Most of it will have been sold in 90 days. Decide how much you want, make the necessary first payment, and receive our Bond for Deed. Don't forget about the Maywood Colony Advocate, if you want to read up on California and its industries. Twenty-four issues will go to you for 24 cents in stamps.

10. When did celibacy among Christian priests come into vogue?

Questions of the Week

1. What is the contribution per capita in the various denominations in this country for Home and Foreign Missions respectively, and is it sufficient to indicate a general desire for the hastening of the Second Coming of our Lord?

The small per capita contribution of the evangelical churches in the United States does not indicate a general desire for the second coming of Christ. Even in the Northern Presbyterian Church, nearly a million strong, and which ranks high in the list, the per capita contribution is less than $1 to foreign missions, and a little over that sum to domestic missions. Among the Congregationalists the per capita is 60 cents for foreign mission, and about 75 cents for domestic. The Lutherans average about 35 cents and 30 cents respectively. The Reformed Church gives slightly over $1 and 43 cents respectively. The seven hundred thousand Protestant Episcopalians contribute 47 cents per capita for foreign work and 40 cents for domestic. The Baptists average less than 50 cents per capita for both purposes. Neither the Methodist figures nor those of any other denomination not mentioned afford any exception to the statement made in the opening sentence. An average of two cents a week from every member of our Evangelical churches would double the revenues of the foreign and home missionary treasuries. Many professing Christians give nothing to missions. M. N. BEATTIE.

2. Would a young woman with strong artistic or literary tendencies be the more likely to improve or sacrifice her career by marriage, there being no guarantee of the husband's sympathy in her special tastes?

A young woman, ambitious for a literary or artistic career, if married at all, should wed a man in sympathy with her tastes; then if forced to renounce her dreams of fame, she will not find herself without either congenial occupation or companionship. Many a woman with artistic tendencies marries happily, but seldom indeed is her career promoted thereby; on the contrary, it too frequently becomes a dream of the past. Marriage presupposes the making of a home, not merely changing the name on one's visiting card. Home-making is a profession by itself, and as no man can serve two masters, so few women can be home-makers and enjoy a public career at the same time. Art and literature are exacting in demands upon their devotees, and half-hearted service seldom wrests fame from either. Again, a man, though possibly proud of his wife's ability, is often dissatisfied with any pursuit or interest that does not directly include himself, and "that way danger lies." All things considered, a woman's career, be it literary, artistic or musical, is best enhanced by thorough, whole-hearted devotion to her chosen profession. ESTHER NORTON.

3. Which nation or nations of the earth may be regarded as furnishing the most heroic instances of disregard of one's own life?

The Anglo-Saxon nations. Their sacrifice is made intelligently and they lay down a life far more worth living than that of Mohammedans who, for instance, with nothing but hardships on earth are convinced that death in battle means immediate entrance into a sensual heaven. The death of General Lawton in the Philippines and of General Wauchope in South Africa are only two conspicuous instances of noble self-sacrifice from motives of principle and duty. R. S. ELLIS.

4. Are famine and pestilence the act of Providence, and if so, is man justified in interfering to stay their course?

Famine and pestilence are not ordinarily to be regarded as the acts of, but rather as permitted by, Providence. There have been visitations of famine and pestilence for which human agents were in no way responsible; they were sent by God's direct decree, in order to further some special purpose. The Old Testament furnishes instances. But usually they are the direct result of man's mismanagement or criminal carelessness. This is true of the devastating fammes of India, and of many of the terrible epidemics of history. It is probable that our own frequently repeated yellow fever plague will be greatly abated, if not wholly conquered, by the sanitary measures now being introduced in Cuba. With man's responsibility for the spread of most of these evils thus established, we may say not only that he is justified in interfering but that it is his urgent duty. J. H. BOMBERGER.

5. Which was the greatest religious revival since the days of Peter?

The Reformation of the sixteenth century. It aroused almost all Europe, brought into prominence the doctrine of justification by faith, showed up the worldliness and immorality which prevailed in church circles, established the right of private judgment in religious matters, and gave the Bible to the common people. For widespread and enduring influence for good no other religious movement since the days of Peter can be compared to it. R. L. FORESTER.

6. To which of America's writers of fiction, living or dead, must first place be assigned?

Nathaniel Hawthorne. Washington Irving, a most popular American novelist, marvelously fruitful in the invention of incident, picturesque and striking in portrayal, magical for beauty of description, might have disputed the palm, but Irving has not that fineness, that exquisiteness in his literary form, the ease, the grace, and the brilliancy of expression which characterize Hawthorne's works, nor that deep and subtle insight into the inmost recesses of the heart. It was on the mystical side that Hawthorne apprehended things, and, like a magician's invisible wand, he wielded his indescribably delicate art in expression. To vitalize fiction there is needed creative faculty with rare parts to work with. Hawthorne had both. In tragic power; in its grasp of the inherited passions of human nature; in searching psychological analysis and pungent application to conscience The Scarlet Letter is not only Hawthorne's, but America's greatest book of fiction.

KATHARINE DIX CRANDALL.

7. How is one to know, absolutely, that he or she is called to personal work in the ministry or missionary field?

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon used to say that if a man felt he could as readily take up any other vocation as he could that of the ministry, then he was not called to preach. John Wesley used to insist on grace, gifts and fruits in a candidate. Presuming one has a burning conviction that he is called to the ministry at home or abroad, then if he has shown an aptitude in presenting religious truth and in winning others to its acceptance and is ready to sacrifice cheerfully material advantages that another vocation might afford, and is sure that he has no desire for the sacred office for any honor among men that it may seem to bring, he may well look for further and definite guidance in the matter. This guidance will be ensured in answer to much earnest prayer, in consultation with godly friends and by providential indications. S. M. FULTON.

8. Which poet since the days of Christ ranks highest from a purely Christian standpoint?

If the literary merit of a solitary Christian poem entitles the author to rank "highest," the prize should be given to Milton for his Paradise Lost. Many Christian poets have written superior and immortal hymns. In the Bibliotheca Sacra for January and April, 1864, the distinguished Lutheran critic of sacred poetry, Rev. Frederick M. Bird, gives to Charles Wesley the highest place among Christian poets. His thousands of poems contain five hundred masterpieces. Mr. Bird eulogized his "Funeral Hymns" as "the noblest specimens of his genius." Montgomery was enraptured with his "Wrestling Jacob;" and of his celebrated hymn "Stand the Omnipotent Decree," Mr. Southey wrote: "It is the finest lyric in the English language."

S. V. LEECH.

9. What may be considered the greatest evil of the present day?

The liquor traffic. It is responsible for 35 per cent. of idiocy, 45 per cent. of lunacy, 80 per cent. of crime, and 90 per cent. of pauperism. It has been well said that his traffic "neutralizes educational agencies, silences the voice of religion, baffles penal reform, obstructs political reform, gives to ignorance and vice a greater potency than intelligence or virtue can command, deprives the poor of the advantages of modern progress, debauches and degrades millions below the plane of healthy savagery, and fills the centres of population with creatures dangerous to their generation."

MARY U. JONES.

10. Would a combination of all the Protestant denominations be calculated to serve the interests of Protestantism or otherwise?

No. Could all Christians unite in one body on the vital doctrines of Christianity, such a combination might do much to show the unity of believers. That unity can, however, be emphasized by interdenominational charity and toleration. The mere outward combination of all the Protestant denominations would probably be accomplished and sustained at the cost of fidelity to the greatest principle of Protestantism—the right of private judgment. It would tend to acceptance without intelligent conviction of the tenets of Protestantism.

Emperor William Reopening the Famous Garrison Church at Potsdam

THE IMPERIAL PARTY AND ROYAL MILITARY ESCORT IN FRONT OF THE CHURCH

1. The Empress of Germany.—2. Emperor William

ONE of the most impos- religious ceremonies ermany has witnessed in ecent years, s the dedi- tion of the arrison rche" at otsdam, hich took ace lately. he Emper- and Em- ess attend- in person th their tes, and all t could be ne to give ignificence the occa- on was ne. The urch is that which the mperor and s officers orship, and now probably the finest the empire. It has been tirely reconstructed, to ling it into accord with mod- ideas. The gossips averred t the reason for the reno- tion was that the old church s haunted, but the Emperor not the kind of a man to be ured by uneasy ghosts. If s midnight reveries were dis- bed at all by the old church, was because its design was offence to his architectural ste. In any case, the church s been entirely remodeled d is said to have realized e Emperor's ideal.

The interior of the historic ifice bears little resem- nce now to an ordinary urch. In design it is more e an opera house, but there no special sanctity in any der of architecture and the mperor probably thought at he could not do better an follow a model which d proved appropriate for posing spectacles, as well giving the best acoustic ad- ntages. Its non-ecclesias- al appearance is emphasiz- by the flags which form e most conspicuous part of e decorations. The flags. owever, are in harmony with e purpose of the building, d we can imagine the aiser looking at them and ying, "not unto us, not unto , but unto Thy name be all e glory." They are the ophies of German arms and ere brought home by the ctors in the wars of 1813-15, e Austro-Prussian war and e great war with Napo- on III. in 1870. To a potente who sincerely regards mself as "the Lord's anoint- ," the placing of these flags the imperial church is a fit d proper acknowledgment the divine favor. The great ilding is abundantly lighted the daytime by richly stain- windows and illumined at ght by myriads of electric hts in the large centre chan- eliers, and in many wall can- elabras. The altar furnishings e of bronze, the pillars of olored marble, and the rail- gs, dividing the floor spaces, f ornamental wrought iron- ork, brass and bronze. The altar stands near the entrance to the crypt, opposite e pulpit, and almost directly under the Emperor's pew. As it is an old custom at the King of Prussia shall sit surrounded by his generals, his officers and his soldiers, when at divine service, the imperial pew is placed in the centre of the first alcony, and below the Emperor, on the main floor, is the pew for the Empress, er sister sovereigns and the ladies of the court. The galleries are used by the oldiers; the main floor is reserved for officers and high civil officials and their fam- es, and a small portion for the general public.

INTERIOR OF THE CHAPEL, SHOWING THE ROYAL PEWS, OR STALLS

The Empress' pew is the lower stall in front of the platform and to the left of the picture. The Emperor's is immediately over it

The church, as originally built by the great Frederick, had backless benches, so that his great grenadiers had to sit up straight during services, but he had thoughtfully put the benches far apart, and they were open below the seats to allow them ample space for their long legs. The fronts of the balconies are painted uniformly in white and decorated at regular intervals with gilded shields bearing the names of the eight royal Hohenzollerns from Frederick I. to Frederick III. On each side of the shield in every instance, is a long frame containing in letters of gold the Bible texts which were either favorite passages of the respective monarchs or were deemed characteristic of their persons or reigns.

Those on the west side of the church are Frederick I.: Psalm 23: 1; Rev. 3: 11; Eccles. 8: 2; Psalm 46 : 12. Frederick William I.: Psalm 26 : 8; Exodus 15 : 3; Luke 16 : 10; James 1 : 22. Frederick II.: Psalm 101 : 6; Matt. 22 : 21; Acts 16 : 31; I. Cor. 16 : 13. Frederick William II.: I. Peter 2 : 17; Psalm 20 : 6; Matt. 26 : 41; Rev. 2 : 10. Those on the east side are: Frederick William III.: Psalm 22 : 5; 108 : 14; Phil. 2 : 12; II. Timothy 2 : 3. Frederick William IV.: Joshua 24 : 15; Rom. 1 : 16; Luke 11 : 28; I. Timothy 6 : 12. On the south side, to the right and left of the altar, are: William I.: Rom. 12 : 12; Psalm 118 : 14; Psalm 100 : 1, 2; Psalm 98 : 1. Frederick III.: Heb. 13 : 8; Matt. 11 : 28; Isaiah 6 : 3; James 5 : 13.

Only two of the eight kings are buried in the church. They are Frederick William I. and Frederick II., called the Great. The former had expressed a desire to be buried there and his wish was gratified. His body was placed in the crypt under the altar on May 31, 1740. By his side lie the remains of his famous son, who had wished a far different resting place. He desired to be laid in the crypt of his favorite palace, Sans Souci, and to be buried without pomp or display. It would not have been safe in his lifetime to disregard his wishes; but after his death there was nothing to prevent the sturdy old king being buried as others thought best. So, with a national pageant, he was laid beside his father in the Garrison Church. Frederick William I. had been anxious that his Queen, Sophia Dorothea, should be buried in the crypt beside him. He had ordered for her a coffin of ebony enclosed in black marble, an exact counterpart of his own. His autograph letters, containing a description of the coffin, are still in existence. It was made in Holland, and was placed in the crypt ready for the time when it would be needed. But when that time came, other counsels prevailed, and the coffin was taken up and sent to Berlin and the royal lady was buried in it there.

The present Emperor has taken a lively interest in the rebuilding of the old church and has personally contributed eighteen thousand dollars toward the expenses.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

The Busybody

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Peter 4:15, ...

A busybody in other men's matters

HUMAN nature is the same in all ages. In the second century of the world's existence people had the same characteristics as people in the nineteenth century, the only difference being that they had the characteristics for a longer time. It was five hundred years of goodness or five hundred years of meanness, instead of goodness or meanness for forty or fifty years. Well, Simon Peter, who was a keen observer of what was going on around him, one day caught sight of a man whose characteristics were severe inspection and blatant criticism of the affairs belonging to people for whom he had no responsibility, and with the hand once browned and hardened by fishing-tackle drew this portrait for all subsequent ages: "A busybody in other men's matters."

That kind of person has been a trouble-maker in every country since the world stood. Appointing himself to the work of exploration and detection, he goes forth mischief-making. He generally begins by reporting the infelicity discovered. He is the advertising agent of infirmities and domestic inharmony and occurrences that but for him would never have come to the public eye or ear. He feels that the secret ought to be hauled out into light and heralded. If he can get one line of it into the newspapers, that he feels to be a noble achievement to start with. But he must not let it stop. He whispers it to his neighbors, and they, in turn, whisper it to their neighbors, until the whole town is abuzz and agog. You can no more catch it or put it down than you can a malaria. It is in the air and on the wing and afloat. Taken by itself, it seems of little importance, but after a hundred people have handled it, and each has given it an additional twist, it becomes a story, in size and shape marvelous. If it can be kept going, after a while it will be large enough to call the attention of the courts or the presbyteries or conferences or associations. The most of the scandals abroad are the work of the one whom Peter in the text styles, "A busybody in other men's matters."

First, notice that such a mission is most undesirable, because we all require all the time we can get to take care of our own affairs. To carry ourselves through the treacherous straits of this life demands that we all the time keep our hand on the wheel of our own craft. While, as I shall show you before I get through, we all have a mission of kindness to others, we have no time to waste in doing that which is damaging to others.

There is our worldly calling, which must be looked after or it will become a failure. Who succeeds in anything without concentrating all his energies upon that one thing? All those who try to do many things go to pieces, either as to their health or their fortune. They go on until they pay ten cents on the dollar, or pay their body into the grave. We cannot manage the affairs of others and keep our own affairs prosperous. While we are inquiring how precarious is the business of another merchant, and finding out how many notes he has unpaid, and how soon he will probably be wound up, or make an assignment, or hear the sheriff's hammer smite his counter, our own affairs are getting mixed up and endangered. While we are criticising our neighbor for his poor crops we are neglecting the fertilization of our own fields or allowing the weeds to choke our own corn.

Gadders about town, with hands in pockets and hats set far back on the head, waiting to hear baleful news, are failures now or will be failures. Christian men and women who go round with mouth and looks full of interrogation points to find how some other church member is given to exaggeration, or drinks too much, or neglects his home for greater outside attractions, have themselves so little grace in their hearts that no one suspects they have any. In proportion as people are consecrated and holy and useful, they are lenient with others and disposed to say: "Wait until we hear the other side of that matter. I cannot believe that charge made against that man or woman until we have some better testimony than that given by these scandal-mongers. I guess it is a lie."

Furthermore, we are incapacitated for the supervisal of others because we cannot see all sides of the affair reprehended. People are generally not so much to blame as we suppose. It is never right to do wrong, but there may be alleviations. There may have arisen a conjunction of circumstances which would have flung any one of us. The world gives only one side of the transaction, and that is always the worst side.

Better die than do the least wrong, but moderate your anathema against the wrongdoer by the circumstances which may yet develop. Be economical of your curses when all the community is hounding some man or woman. Wait, consider, pause and hope that which is charged is a base fabrication. Do not be like a jury who should render verdict against the defendant without allowing him to present his side of the case. I know not what your observation has been, but I have never known a case of default in character but there were some circumstances which ought to weigh on the side of the recreant. The most repugnant character on earth to me is the man who believes everything he hears against others and hurls all the slandered down the same embankment of denunciation. I dislike such a one more than I dislike the offender for whom he has no mercy.

Furthermore, we make ourselves a disgusting spectacle when we become busybodies. What a diabolical enterprise those undertake who are ever looking for the moral lapse or downfall of others! As the human race is a most imperfect race, all such hunters find plenty of game. There have been Sewing Societies in churches which tore to pieces more reputations than they made garments for the poor. With their sarcasms and sly hints and depreciation of motives, they punctured more good names than they had needles. With their scissors they cut character bias, and backstitched every evil report they got hold of. Meetings of boards of directors have sometimes ruined good business men by insinuations against them. The bad work may not have been done so much by words, for they would be libelous, but by a twinkle of the eye, or a shrug of the shoulder, or a sarcastic accentuation of a word. "Yes, he is all right when he is sober." "Have you inquired into that man's history?" "Do you know what business he was in before he entered this?" "I move that the application be laid on the table until some investigations now going on are consummated." It is easy enough to start a suspicion that will never down, but what a despicable man is the one who started it!

There is not an honest man in Washington or New York or any other city who cannot be damaged by such infernalism. In a village where I once lived a steamboat every day came to the wharf. An enemy of the steamboat company asked one day: "I wonder if that steamboat is safe?" The man who heard the question soon said to his neighbor: "There is some suspicion about the safety of that steamboat." And the next one who got hold of it said: "There is an impression abroad that there will soon be an accident on that steamer." Soon all that community began to say: "That steamer is very unsafe," and as a consequence we all took the stage rather than risk our lives on the river. The steamer was entirely sound and safe, but one interrogation in regard to her started a suspicion that went on until the steamboat company was ruined. Precisely so noble reputations and good enterprises and useful styles of business are slain by interrogation points. Can you imagine any creature so loathsome as the one who feels himself or herself called to question all integrity, all ability, all honesty, all character? Buzzards looking for carrion.

While I believe enough in human depravity to be orthodox, I tell you that the most of people whom I know are doing the best they can. Faults? Oh, yes: all people except you and I have faults. But they are sorry about it, repentant on account of it, and are trying to do better. About all the married people I know of are married to the one person best suited. Nearly all the parents with whom I am acquainted are doing the best they can for their children. All the clerks in stores, so far as I know, are honest: and all persons in official position, city, state, or nation, are fulfilling their mission as well as they can. The most of those who have failed in business, so far as I know, have failed honestly. The singers are singing their best songs, the sculptors chiseling their best statues, the painters penciling their best pictures, the ministers preaching their best sermons. Take any audience that assembles in any church, and if there are five hundred people assembled, I think at least four hundred and fifty are doing the best they can, and if there be five thousand assembled, at least forty-five hundred are doing the best they can.

While I was thinking upon this subject, I made a visit to one of the national bureaus in this capital, and found that out of eleven hundred millions of money that had passed through the hands of more than four hundred employees, only three cents were unaccounted for, and the three cents were afterwards found. What a compliment to common honesty!

How is it that you can always find two opinions about any one, and those two opinions exactly opposite? I will tell you the reason. It is because there are two sides to every character—the best side and the worst side. A well-disposed man chiefly seeks the best side. The badly disposed seeks chiefly the worst side. Be ours the desire to see the best side, for it is healthier for us so to do and stirs admiration, which is an elevated state, while the desire to find the worst side keeps one in a spirit of disquietude and disgust and mean suspicion, and that is a pulling down of our own nature, a disfigurement of our own character. I am afraid the imperfections of others will kill us yet.

The habit I deplore is apt to show itself in the visage. A kindly man who wishes everybody well soon demonstrates his disposition in his looks. His features may fracture all the laws of handsome physiognomy, but God puts into that man's eyes and in the curve of his nostril and in the upper and lower lip the signature of divine approval. And you see it at a glance, as plainly as though it had been written all over his face in rose color: "This is one of my princes. He is on the way to coronation. I bless him now with all the benedictions that infinity can afford. Look at him. Admire him. Congratulate him."

On the other hand, if one be cynical about the character of others, and chiefly observant of defects and glad to find something wrong in character, the fact is apt to be demonstrated in his looks. However regular his features, and though constructed according to the laws of Kaspar Lavater, his visage is sour. He may smile, but it is a sour smile. There is a sneer in the inflation of the nostril. There is a mean curvature to the lip. There is a bad look in the eye. The devil of sarcasm and malevolence and suspicion has taken possession of him, and you see it as plainly as though from the hair line of the forehead to the lowest point in the round of his chin it were written: "Mine! Mine! I, the demon of the pit, have soured his visage with my curse. Look at him! He chose a diet of carrion. He gloated over the misdeeds of others. It took all my infernal engineery to make him what he is—'a busybody in other men's matters.'"

But there is a worthy and Christian way of looking abroad upon others, not for the purpose of bringing them to disadvantage, or advertising their weaknesses, or putting in "great primer" or "paragon" type their frailties, but to offer help, sympathy, and rescue. That is Christlike, and he who does so will the applause of the high heavens. Ju look abroad for the people who ha made great mistakes, and put a big pla ter of condolence on their laceration Such people are never sympathized wit although they need an infinity of solac Domestic mistakes. Social mistake Ecclesiastical mistakes. Political m takes. The world has for such or jocosity and gesture of deploration. The is an unoccupied field for you, my broth No one has been there. Take your ca of medicines and go there, and ask the where they are hurt and apply divi medicament.

There is a public man who has made political mistake from which he will nev recover. At the next elections he will put back and put down into a place disapproval from which he will never ris Just go to that man, and unroll the scro of one hundred splendid Americans wh after occupying high places of prom tion, were relegated to private life a public scorn. Show him in what glorio company he has been placed by the an thema of the ballot-box.

There is a man or woman who h made a conjugal mistake, and a vultu has been put into the same cage with dove, or a lion and a lamb in the san jungle. The world laughs at the misfo tune, but it is your business to weep wi their woe. There is a merchant wh bought at the wrong time, or a manufa turer whose old machinery has been supe seded by a new invention, or who und change of tariff on certain styles of fabr has been dropped from affluence into ban ruptcy. Go to him and recall the nam of fifty business men who lost all b their honesty and God and heaven. L them know there are hundreds of goo men who have gone under that a thought of in heavenly spheres mo than many who are high up and goin higher. All will acknowledge that goo and lovely Arthur Tappan, who failed business, was more to be admired tha William Tweed in possession of his stole millions.

Go to that literary man who is starvin with a brilliant pen in his right hand, h literary position lost, his books unsalabl and tell him of the mightiest of the pa and the present who suffered from no appreciation. Show the discouraged a thor, whose manuscript the publishin house will not take, that among the re jected manuscripts of the publishin houses for awhile were Paradise Los and Jane Eyre, and Thackeray's Va ity Fair, and Vestiges of Creation, an Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Hear it! the more you go to busyin yourselves in other men's matters th better, if you have design of offering re lief. Search out the quarrels, that yo may settle them; the fallen, that you ma lift them; the pangs, that you may a suage them. Arm yourself with two bo tles of divine medicine, the one a toni and the other an anæsthetic; the latter t soothe and quiet, the former to stimulat to inspire to sublime action. That man' matters need looking after in this respec There are ten thousand men and wome who need your help, and need it righ away. They do not sit down and cry They make no appeal for help, but with in ten yards of where you sit in churc and within ten minutes' walk of you home there are people in enough troubl to make them shriek out with agony i they had not resolved upon suppression

If you are rightly interested in othe men's matters, go to those who are jus starting in their occupations or profes sions and give them a boost. Those ol physicians do not want your help, fo they are surrounded with more patient than they can attend to, but cheer thos young doctors who are counting out thei first drops to patients who cannot affor to pay. Those old attorneys at the la want no help from you, for they take re tainers only from the more prosperou clients, but cheer those young attorney who have not had a brief at all lucrative Those old merchants have their busines so well established that they feel inde pendent of banks, of all changes in tariffs of all panics, but cheer those young mer chants who are making their first mis takes in bargain and sale.

We pity people who have met with bereavements or accidents or great losses but there are "other men's matters" tha are never reported, though they ar rushing to the last degree. Search them ut. Alleviate them. Give them practi- il help. Have a word of appropriate mpathy. Do not go in at some case of ereavement and quote conventionally om the Bible, as I have heard it quoted nid such circumstances: "We all do de as a leaf." "Man that is born of oman is of few days, and full of trouble," id so on. The Bible, like an apothe- ary store, has many medicines, and they e all good, but are not alike suited to l cases.

Go forth to be a busybody in other en's matters, so far as you can helping em out, and help them on. The world full of instances of those who spend eir life in such alleviations. But there one instance that overtops and eclipses l others. He had lived in a palace, adiant ones waited upon him. He was arioted along streets yellow with gold, id stopped at gates glistening with pearl, id hosannaed by immortals coroneted id in snowy white. Centuries gave him ot a pain. The sun that rose on him ever set. His dominions could not be en- rged, for they had no boundaries, and ncontested was his reign. Upon all that stre and renown and environment of blendors he turned his back and put own his crown at the foot of his throne, id on a bleak December night trod his ay down to a stone house in Bethlehem our world.

He could not see a woman doubled up ith rheumatism, but he touched her, id inflamed muscles relaxed and she ood straight up. He could not meet funeral of a young man, but he broke the procession and gave him back to s widowed mother. With spittle on the of his finger he turned the midnight total blindness into the midnoon of rfect sight. He could not see a man own on his mattress helpless with palsy thout calling him up to health, and tell- g him to shoulder the mattress and walk f. He could not see a crowd of hungry ople but he made enough good bread d a surplus that required all the baskets. ll for others. His birth for others. is ministry for others. His death for hers. His ascension for others. His thronement for others.

That spirit which leads one to be busy r the betterment of others is going to lenize the round earth. That spirit in- ced John Pounds to establish "Ragged hools," and Father Matthew to become temperance reformer, and though our eans be limited and our opportunities rcumscribed, we can do the same thing a small scale. "Other men's matters!" busybodies in improving them. With nd words, with earnest prayers, with lf-sacrificing deeds, with enlarging chari- s, let us go forth on a new mission.

And now my words are to the invisible ultitudes I reach week by week, but yet ll never see in this world, but whom I pect to meet at the bar of God, and pe to see in the blessed heaven. The st word that Dwight L. Moody, the great angelist, said to me at Plainfield, N. J., d he repeated the message for me to hers, was: "Never be tempted under y circumstances to give up your weekly blication of sermons throughout the rld." That solemn charge I will ed as long as I have strength to give em, and the newspaper types desire to ke them. Oh, ye people back there in e sheep pastures of Australia, and ye nid the pictured terraces of New Zea- nd, and ye dwellers on the banks of e Androscoggin and the Alabama and e Mississippi, and the Caspian and Yel- w seas; ye of the four corners of the earth ho have greeted me again and again, cept this point-blank offer of safety and aven, "without money and without ice." What a Gospel for all lands, all nes, all ages! Gospel of sympathy! spel of hope! Gospel of emancipa- n! Gospel of sunlight! Gospel of en- ronement! Gospel of eternal victory! ike it, all ye people, until your sins are pardoned, and your sorrows all solaced, d your wrongs all righted, and your ing pillow be spread at the foot of a lder which, though like the one that as let down to Bethel, may be thronged th descending and ascending immortals, all nevertheless have room enough for u to climb, foot over foot, on rungs of ht, till you go clear up out of sight of earthly perturbation, into the realm here "the wicked cease from troubling d the weary are at rest."

MOODY AS I KNEW HIM

Edgar W. Hawley's Reminiscences of the Evangelist

. . . Many Incidents Never Before Published

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is to-day privileged to lay before its readers a page of absorbing interest in the life of the great evangelist, Dwight L. Moody, containing many incidents that have never before been made public. One of Mr. Moody's first associates in active spiritual work, after he had settled in Chicago, was Edgar Wilson Hawley, a young merchant, who became his companion and fellow-worker in many soul-winning campaigns in the Western States. Mr. Hawley is now Chairman of the Missionary Committee of the New York State Sunday School Association. His experiences as Mr. Moody's co-worker cover a period of forty years and begin at a much earlier date than most of his other associates. We give the reminiscences so far as possible in his own words.

Mr. Moody's Conversion "It was in 1855 that Mr. Moody experienced soul-awakening and conversion. It occurred in Boston in the old Mount Vernon Congregational church. Many years ago Joseph Cook went to the records of this church and had them copied. I have preserved a copy of the entry then made on the church record. Here it is:

"No. 1,079. Dwight L. Moody. Boards 43 Court street. Has been baptized. First awakened on the 16th of May. Became anxious about himself. Saw himself a sinner, and sin now seems hateful, and holiness desirable. Thinks he has repented. Has purposed to give up sin. Feels dependent on Christ for forgiveness. Loves the Scriptures. Prays. Desires to be useful. Religiously educated. Been in the city a year. From Northfield, this State. Is not ashamed to be known as a Christian. Eighteen years old.

"March 13, 1856.—Thinks he has made some progress since he was here before, at least in knowledge. Has maintained his habits of prayer and reading the Scriptures. Believes God will hear his prayers. Is fully determined to adhere to the cause of Christ always. Feels that it would be very bad if he should join the church and then turn. Must repent of sin and ask forgiveness for Christ's sake. Will never give up his hope, or love Christ less, whether admitted to the church or not. His prevailing intention is to give up his will to God.

How a Merchant Prince was Won "One man who helped Moody, probably more than any other at that time, with wise counsel and with his purse, was John V. Farwell, the dry goods merchant of Chicago. He was a member of the Methodist church. One day Mr. Moody went to visit him. Farwell was surrounded by merchandise and absorbed in business, but Moody sat down and began to talk to him.

"'Mr. Farwell,' he said, 'isn't there something besides these boxes to look after?' (indicating the dry goods boxes that lay around in the warehouse.)

"From that time on Mr. Farwell was a wide-awake, earnest, active Gospel worker and a supporter of Moody. He became the superintendent of Moody's Sunday School in its earlier days.

Moody's "Praying Closet" "Moody was a firm believer in noonday prayer meetings. The Chicago noonday meeting had been greatly neglected, and was only kept alive by the constant attendance of one good Christian woman, who never failed to go there and to read and pray. When Moody learned of this, he felt it to be his duty to do what he could to rally people to that meeting. It was held in the Methodist church block, corner Washington and Clark Streets—a thoroughfare of leading retail stores, the hall being upstairs over the stores. That place became a spiritual exchange; people came there to learn what was going on in spiritual work. Mr. Moody was always there, and found an ample field for his strong persuasive powers. None of the speakers were allowed to talk longer than three minutes: they were then called down by a tap of the bell. In a little nook under the stairs there was a closet which might possibly have held four or five persons at most. It was known as Moody's "Praying Closet." I have been in there with him, when we have had two men with us, all in the dark, our hands on their shoulders as we prayed for and with them. More than one man has been converted in that little dark closet.

"Moody was invariably found at the foot of the stairs, about fifteen minutes before the noon hour, talking to passers-by and inviting them in. He would say: 'Look here, my friend; haven't you time to run upstairs and get a blessing?' 'I wonder if you aren't Moody?' said one man. 'I am. Come right up' was the cordial answer. A few minutes before twelve he would mount the stairs and open the meeting. At its close he always slipped down again and shook hands with the people at the door.

A Minstrel Convert "In the North Market Hall work, there was also a large evening preaching meeting. A well-known baritone singer—Frank Lombard—who had become popular in concerts and saloons, was approached by Moody. 'Frank,' said he, 'if you will come and sing in my meetings, we will pray for you every day.' This struck the vocalist as a rather humorous proposition, but he said: 'I'll do it'—and he kept his word, and became a regular and model attendant thereafter.

How He Caught the Bishop "The North Side was strongly Catholic, and Moody was sometimes interfered with. On one occasion, when he had a good-sized crowd of boys in his Mission, a Catholic priest came and drove them away. Moody would visit a Catholic family as readily as he would a Protestant household. He even attempted to pray with them, but they would not permit him. The bishop of the diocese was a stern old man named Duggan, whom the Protestants feared. Moody determined to visit him. He went, and was soon ushered into the prelate's presence. 'Bishop,' said he, 'I'm around among your people a great deal, and they speak very highly of you, so I thought I would like to come and see the man who had so many souls under his care. I come to ask a favor.' 'What is it?' inquired the bishop. 'That you will pass the word among your people that they may permit me to enter their houses and pray with them.' 'Oh, I cannot advise that,' said the bishop. 'You just come into our church, and I will open every door in Chicago to you.' 'I cannot do that,' was Moody's rejoinder. 'I believe in union work, and at our union prayer meeting every day we meet without regard to denominational differences, and if I became a Catholic I couldn't go there and pray.' 'Yes, you could,' retorted the bishop. 'What!' exclaimed Moody, 'Can Catholics and Protestants pray together?' 'Certainly,' was the answer. 'Then let us pray!' came like a flash from the lips of the evangelist. The bishop was fairly caught, and he knew it. Moody dropped on his knees, and so did the prelate. Each waited for the other to begin, but neither spoke, although they were furtively eyeing each other. At last the bishop signaled to Moody to lead. In telling me the story afterward, he said, 'I prayed most earnestly for his people, that God would guide them into the light: and then he prayed, but I felt disappointed that he didn't pray for me. We arose, and, on shaking me warmly by the hand, the bishop said: 'I refer you to Father——, of the North Side, for anything you may want.' It was a singular fight, uniquely won.

MRS. DWIGHT L. MOODY

Outwitting a Bully "Moody was President of the Chicago Y. M. C. A. One day a rough-looking fellow came into the Association rooms and seeing him said: "Mr. Moody, I can't keep a dollar. I drink and gamble it all away. Now, here's five dollars, and I want to leave it with you. You can let me have it when I need it. Moody took the money in good faith. A week or so later the fellow came in and said: 'Mr. Moody, I've come for that ten dollars. 'Why!' said Moody in some surprise, 'You gave me only five dollars.' 'You lie!' said the bully angrily, 'I gave you ten dollars.' He left after threatening to thrash Moody at the first opportunity. The latter held a meeting two or three times a week in one rather rough locality. One evening, after their meeting had been dismissed, Moody was gathering up the hymn books when in came the rough with two other fellows of the same stamp from a side-door. 'Now, Moody,' he called out, 'pay me that ten dollars or take a licking.' 'I'll pay five dollars,' was the quick reply. 'No; you'll have to pay ten dollars or you'll suffer.' 'Well,' said Moody, calmly, 'Will you hold on till I get through packing up the hymn books?' 'Cert'nly, we are here for the night. Go on with yer business.' There was a young man—a Christian worker—with Moody, and the latter told him quietly to go home. He did so, and the evangelist was left alone in the room with the three rowdies. He kept right on collecting the hymn books and in a little while came within reach of the gas meter. A quick turn of his wrist and the room was in darkness. He easily escaped by a rear door, leaving the rowdies in confusion, and stumbling over the seats in their haste to follow him. Outside, Mr. Moody came across a policeman whom he sent to the hall, and the three roughs were arrested and taken to jail. They had digged a pit and been caught in it.

"The Worst Man in town" "Moody's physical strength was phenomenal. I have seen no less than half a dozen young men try to 'down him' in a good-natured athletic contest, but they failed. Frequently he would go out into the country in Illinois and Wisconsin and hold meetings. At times he would go off on such trips absolutely penniless, trusting to the Lord to provide what he needed: and men who knew him and his work would hand him $5, $7, or $10—always enough to meet the emergency. On one occasion in a country town, they asked him where he would like to go, now that the work was over. He said: 'Take me to the home of the worst man in your town.' 'Well,' was the reply, 'we have such a man, and his wife is a strong Christian woman. He is an ugly passionate fellow, a carpenter by trade and an avowed infidel.' Moody went to the man's shop and began conversation. Said he: 'Do you know that Jesus of Nazareth was a carpenter?' 'No!' was the surly answer, 'don't know and don't care.' 'I think there's something about a carpenter's work that must have a special interest for him,' persisted Moody, 'and don't you think he never made a bad job and that no work was ever turned back on him?' The infidel looked hard at Moody. He began to be interested. The evangelist talked in his most persuasive way and succeeded in convincing him that Jesus was one who loved even such as he. Before leaving town, soon afterward, Mr. Moody saw the carpenter's wife. 'Your husband,' he told her, 'will be converted, and when I come over this way again, two days from now, on the train (her house stood near the track) you will signal to me if he is converted. If not, I won't expect you to signal.' Two days later, as Moody passed on the train, he looked over toward the carpenter's house, and there stood the woman on the porch excitedly waving a big white table-cloth in the direction of the cars to announce her infidel husband's change of heart.

A Wonderful Barrel of Flour "In his house on the North Side, Mr. Moody had a 'Prophet's Chamber', a room which was always kept available for the use of any guest who might come to visit there, especially of young men engaged in active Christian work. A sojourner of this class would get a hearty supper and be privileged to occupy the 'Prophet's Chamber' over night. One morning, Moody came down from the room and Mrs. Moody said: 'We have hardly a particle of flour left; it's all gone.' 'That so?' said Moody, and he turned and went upstairs again to tell the Lord about it. Then he went off to his work for the day. He came home at night and never thought of the flour. 'You know that flour you sent to-day? It's the best we have had in a long time,' began Mrs. Moody, briskly. Her husband looked at her with an odd expression. 'Yes,' she continued, 'about eleven o'clock the barrel came all right.' 'Well, if it did, God sent it' replied Moody reverently. 'I sent no barrel.'

God Paid the Rent "His rent fell behind until he owed $100. The landlord grew impatient and said: 'I'll give you just a little more time; if you can't pay up you must move out.' Things went along until the night before the proposed day of payment. That evening a young man called upon Mr. Moody—a young business man—and Moody was apprehensive that he would be somewhat of a bore. He talked along for a while, and when he arose to leave he said: 'Mr. Moody, we have been taking account of stock, and I have come to bring you a thank-offering for the Lord.' And so saying, he handed Moody $100. It was a purely providential gift, as Mr. Moody had no expectation of the money from any source, and had trusted the unfailing Provider in this as in all his other affairs.

A Debate With an Infidel "A notorious infidel kept a saloon in town. Moody had already got the man's children to attend his Sunday School, but the infidel scoffed at his work, as he did at all religion. Moody met him and they talked together. The infidel told him sneeringly that he should read Paine's Age of Reason. 'If you will read the Bible,' said Moody, 'from cover to cover, I will read Paine's Age of Reason from cover to cover.' The man agreed to do so and did read the Bible, while Moody also kept his share of the bargain. 'It was the poorest trash I ever touched,' he said to me afterward. Then they had a debate. In the house were a number of the infidel's friends. Mr. Moody suggested that each debater take half an hour and no more, which was agreed to. The infidel opened the debate by what was intended to be a strong presentation of his side of the question. When he had finished, Moody took the floor. 'Let us pray,' he said, to the surprise of the infidel, who had expected an address and not a prayer. 'Hold on!' he exclaimed, 'Doesn't your Bible say: 'Where two or three are gathered together'? But there's only one of you—you can't do it.' 'Oh,' said Moody, 'I have a boy here—one of my Sunday School boys.' The boy also prayed, and his simple yet eloquent and earnest petition in behalf of the infidel, his wife and children, impressed everybody and drew tears to many eyes. The infidel went up to the boy and looking at him earnestly, said: 'Did Moody teach you that prayer?' 'No,' said the lad, 'The Lord gave it to me.'

"That strange debate changed the current of the infidel's life. He became a frequent attendant at Moody's evening meetings. Whether he ultimately became a Christian I cannot tell."

THE S. S. "SPREE," ON WHICH MR. MOODY CALLED TO GOD AND WAS ANSWERED

DURING a brief furlough from the army in the summer of 1892, important work called me to Spain. After its accomplishment, I went on through Paris to Hamburg, Germany, to meet my daughter-in-law, child and nurse and accompany them to America. We took the large and commodious steamer of the German line, the Spree. She was fairly well filled before we left Hamburg. On arriving off Southampton, a number of passengers were brought to us by a lighter, and as passengers are wont to do, we rushed to the side of our vessel to see the strangers. To my surprise, I saw my old friend, D. L. Moody, and his son, W. R. Moody, coming on board.

We had 750 passengers. We had proceeded about eleven hundred knots on our voyage, when, before day-break Saturday morning, I was awakened by a crash—a sound like the explosion of a cannon. Then hearing the rushing along the halls and excited talk, my roommate and myself got up and dressed. Somebody brought us word that the main shaft had been snapped asunder, and had fallen, making a break in the steamer. I hurried out and went to my daughter's stateroom and found that she was dressed, but that she was very anxious to have her dressing-maid come to her and her child without delay. Some of the people were crying, but the most of those who had rooms in the aft part of the ship were endeavoring to get out of them with such articles as they could gather. The captain, his officers and crew behaved like a well-disciplined army.

The terror of the passengers can be better imagined than described while the water was rushing in so rapidly as to fill at least four after-compartments of the ship. The bulkheads, which unfortunately were open, were speedily closed so that each compartment was segregated. Then the bailing and the pumping cleared out the foremost compartment. After much labor the second was comparatively free from water. Then a gigantic effort was made to clear the third, but the leakage was too great to admit of success, and the last became like a geyser. The aft part of the ship sunk to the gunwale.

Mr. Moody and his son had come on deck; but I did not see them in the midst of the first confusion. A little after sunrise I found Mr. Moody lying back in a sea-chair and his son near at hand. The father was nauseated by the unusual rolling, but not very ill. After asking me a few questions, he said, "General Howard, won't you come with me to my stateroom?" We then made our way quickly to the stateroom. Mr. Will Moody closed the door, whilst his father dropped on his knees, facing his berth, with his hands holding to the edge. He hardly gave us time to kneel before he began to pray, and this is the prayer in substance:

"Oh, Lord, our Saviour, have mercy upon us and save our lives. When on the Sea of Galilee the storm was heavy and the sea was high, thy disciples were in danger and terrified. They cried to thee and thou didst still the waves and save them. Are we not thy disciples and in great peril with all these people on this ship? Please send us a ship to rescue us; and smooth the waves, that we may not sink and be drowned. Bring us safely to land and please do all this for our sakes, for the sake of our friends, and for the sake of our work not yet finished. We ask it all in thy name."

Then Moody said: "General, pray and I tried to do so, following the bent my own thoughts, asking especially f strength to endure whatever should com and for spiritual blessings. Next, M Will Moody followed in a brief pray full of feeling and with evident emotio

Mr. Moody now sat up upon a cam stool and opened his Bible to the ninet first Psalm and read it with animati and interest. While he was reading gave me one of those quick glances th always marked his generalship and sai "This Psalm is just made for this occ sion, isn't it?" As soon as he had finish reading we went again on deck and spe the rest of the day and the followi night in doing what we could to comfo the passengers. Everybody on the sh gathered the next day, Sunday mornin in our dining-saloon. Mr. Moody conduc ed the service in his own inimitable styl It was a wonderful meeting, never to l forgotten.

The next morning, after our forty-eigh hours of hopeless drifting and signals o distress where no eye seemed able to se us, a ship that had come all the wa from Quebec—a steamer named Huro —put in an appearance.

By nine o'clock the cables were attache and we were dragged slowly and steadil for another five days into Queenstown Ireland. We came safely into the sma harbor. It was again Sunday morning an all the devout people, who were deepl grateful to God for their deliverance, gath ered in a little Methodist church. Mood again led the exercises, read appropriat Scripture, gave out hymns of praise an thanksgiving and preached as fine sermon as any of those people ever heard on the subject, "God is love."

Mr. Moody's cablegram to the Unite States, as published, said: "Praye saved the ship!" This, if we may judg by the press, created a heated controvers on the subject of prayer. After my arriva in New York, I was met by reporters who were very solicitous for my view. said then and I now repeat: Mr. Mood asked (his son and myself united in th prayer) for the Lord to send us a ship, t smooth the waves and bring us safe t land. All these things came to pass a we had entreated. God is able to perfor a miracle; but whether he did so or no in this case he has not told us. Our plai duty is to ask and his promise is to an swer.

FISHERS OF MEN

A Story of Jesus' First Disciples
By Dr. and Mrs Wilbur F. Crafts

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 4th. JOHN 1: 35-46

BEHOLD the Lamb of God,' is John's profoundest message and the keynote of the Gospel," said Uncle Will, at our usual Sabbath evening round table of home Bible study. "We have seen John, the hero, daring to rebuke mob and monarch alike, though it would cost him his life. We shall see him in his sublime humility, when his disciples presently complain that Jesus is drawing his audiences away, calling himself 'the friend of the Bridegroom,' who goes before him to tell the bride, the church, of his coming, and then stands back, saying, 'He that hath the bride is the Bridegroom, and the friend of the Bridegroom that standeth and heareth him rejoiceth greatly because of the Bridegroom's voice. He must increase and I must decrease.' In the story before us we see John as the faithful witness, who knows so profoundly the mission of Christ, of which he is called to testify, that he proclaims at its inauguration in the baptism, its consummation at the Cross: 'Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world.' And again the next day, when the young Carpenter of Nazareth again approaches, John seems to see the altar cross of Calvary on the clouds beyond Jesus, and says to his own disciples, gathering up in one sentence the meaning of all the sacrificial types from the altar of Abel, 'Behold the Lamb of God.' Christ, John tells us, is both 'the Son of God' and the 'Lamb of God', that is, a divine Saviour."

"You call that saying, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' the keynote of the Gospel," said Tom Brown, "but I once heard a liberal preacher give that name to the Sermon on the Mount."

"That," said Uncle Will, "is a mistake more excusable in a layman than a preacher, due to the position which that sermon occupies near the beginning of the first gospel. But that humanitarian sermon was not preached until the second year of Christ's ministry. It was preceded in the first year by the sermon on worship at Jacob's well; and that was preceded by the sermon to Nicodemus on regeneration; and that was preceded by John's proclamation of atonement at the very beginning of Christ's ministry, 'Behold the Lamb of God.' Let us keep to Christ's order: First, atonement; second, regeneration; third, worship; fourth, humanitarianism. We should either begin with humanitarianism, nor end with worship."

Mrs. Uncle Will: "It is a very common error to suppose that little children cannot understand the atonement and so can only be urged to 'be good.' Watts and Dr. Newton, in hymns and sermons for children, teach the heresy of natural goodness, which it is one of the chief labors of the preacher to dislodge in after years, lest the cross shall seem of none effect. Rev. Dr. E. P. Hammond and the Children's Special Service Mission, of London, which he founded, both begin Christian work, even for children of the primary grade, as John did, with the cry, 'Behold the Lamb of God.' I have an authentic case of a little Bessie, of London, that on her third birthday showed that she had heard this cry and followed Jesus as the Lamb of God. At the close of that happy day she knelt to say her evening prayer. Her wise mother had already taught her that after repeating a prayer from memory she should think what she wanted to thank God for especially and so make a little prayer of her own. That night she said: 'O, God, I thank you for the birthday and the presents and the party, and—I thank you, O Jesus, that you was punished astead of me.' Her mother thought she could not have really understood those last words of the prayer and so the next day she showed Bessie a picture of Jesus on the cross and said, 'Why did they put Jesus on the cross? Was it because he was very naughty?' 'Oh, no,' said Bessie, 'it was because I was naughty, and he did not want me to be punished, and so he was punished astead of me.'"

Mothers Preparing Child Disciples "Such a mother," said Mr. Sanders, "is a John the Baptist that so fully prepares her little disciples that when the hour is come for open confession of their faith, as quietly as a bud blooms, like Andrew of our story, they follow Jesus. Such child disciples, often depreciated, bring to Christ the fullest service in quantity and quality. You remember the Scotch elder's depreciating remark of a certain communion: 'No one came into the church but wee Bobbie.' But 'wee Bobbie' grew to be the great missionary, Robert Moffatt."

"Here we have a children's creed," said Mrs. Isaacs, "in seven words: 'Behold the Lamb of God.' 'Follow me.' God's part in conversion and man's part, side by side. The cross covers the guilty past. The present and future of a Christian life consist in simply following Jesus. A dying Sabbath School boy of nine years, said, 'I've been trying to walk in the footsteps of Jesus.'"

Hard Enough for a Hero "Sheldon's In His Steps," said Mr. Isaacs, "reminds us that following Christ, though simple enough for a child, is hard enough for a hero. Once, in martyr days as that word, meaning 'confessor,' reminds us, the hard part was to follow him in baptism, in open confession, at the cost of confiscation and execution. We must still follow him on open confession, and that is not always easy. But to really follow Christ in business and pleasure and politics, there is no more heroic path to-day. To follow Christ is not a mechanical imitation of his Oriental customs, but to do only what he would do, to go only where he would go, to say only what he would say, to be silent only where he would be silent, to judge as he would judge, to follow in being as well as doing through the impartation which alone can produce a true imitation of Christ. It was the disciple that Jesus loved whose realized motto was, 'Even as He.' Becoming a Christian is accepting Christ as Saviour and as Leader."

Tom turned his blackboard to view:

"Where he leads I'll follow,
I will follow all the way."

Simplicity of Conversion "Though Christlikeness be hard," said cheery Selah Brown, "this story reminds us that conversion is not. Dr. George F. Pentecost tells of a colored man at a revival meeting who hesitated long over the invitation to seek conversion. 'Do you believe there is a God?' 'O, yes; no doubt of that.' 'And do you believe Christ is able and willing to convert you?' 'No doubt of that.' 'Then why do you wait?' 'Oh, Doctor, I dreads de process.' He was one of the many whose theory of conversion rested on the conversion of two grown up Pharisees: Nicodemus and Saul of Tarsus. The story before us reminds us that every apostle, save Paul, who had been trained wrong from childhood, began a Christian life by a quiet obedience to that call of Jesus, 'Follow me.'"

Mrs Smith: "The tendency to make conversion chiefly a matter of feeling reminds me of the sensible way our Mabel began. A preacher spoke to her as she knelt at the altar in a revival, 'Do you feel any better?' said the preacher. 'No,' said Mabel, 'but I am going to do better.' Repentance means turning, not turning on the tears, but turning about the life."

Uncle Will: "Conversion also means turning, a turning of the will, so that it may be said of you or me even when the life sometimes relapses into sin, 'He that willeth to do his will.' In the very story before us Christ searches below the action for the motive, saying to those who are following him, 'What seek ye?' As it proved, they sought fellowship with him, a fellowship they found so sweet that they formed right there an Andrew and Philip Society, to bring others to him. A society by that name reports that it now has 475 societies with 14,000 members. But that is only a small part of the influence that has gone forth from the examples of those two disciples."

Mrs. Sanders: "When we lived in town and brought five hundred members into the Sabbath School.

The Sight of Jesus the Cure of Doubt "Philip's catch interests me," said Andrew Smith, the soldier, who had come home unscathed even by the canteens. "When Philip had come to Christ he hastened to bring his friend, Nathaniel. Evidently they had often talked of the coming Messiah. 'We have found him!' exclaimed Philip. But when he spoke of His being from Nazareth, Nathaniel began to doubt. If Philip had replied that he came originally from Bethlehem, the debate would have gone on about some new difficulty. 'When a matter can be tested, why argue?' said Philip. 'Come and see.' The sight of Jesus proved the cure of doubt."

Mr. Sanders: "That reminds me that Mr. Aitken, the English evangelist, while preaching on one occasion, observed an elderly gentleman with whom he felt sure the Spirit of God was striving. He sought conversation with him afterward, when the old gentleman admitted that the discourse had interested him deeply, but added, 'I am of a very analytical turn of mind, and I should have to weigh and examine your statements before I could receive them.' 'Let me call on you to-morrow,' said the earnest preacher, and an interview was arranged. When he did so, he found the man completely broken down under a sense of sin, and was enabled to lead him to Jesus. Then the old man said: 'What a fool I was to talk to you as I did yesterday. I did not know what to say, so I made an excuse of my analytical turn of mind. What I wanted was salvation.' God's part in saving a man or saving a world may be mysterious, but our part has no philosophical difficulties. First: 'Come and see;' then, 'Follow me.'"

He Leadeth Me Uncle Will: "What wisdom God has shown in giving us not only a written Bible, but a Living Example! What is God like? Jesus answers: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' What is it to live a Christian life? Jesus answers: 'I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done.'"

Andrew Brown: "Turkish generals say to their soldiers: 'Go on! Go on!' while remaining themselves in the rear. But wiser and more successful generals lead the way, saying to their soldiers: 'Come on!' When Alexander the Great was once leading his army over some mountains, they found their way all stopped up with ice and snow. The soldiers were tired out with hard traveling and so disheartened with the difficulties before them that they halted. It seemed as if they would rather lie down and die than try to go any farther. When Alexander saw this, he did not scold the men, but got down from his horse, laid aside his cloak, took up a pickax, and, without saying a word to any one, went quietly to work, digging away at the ice. As soon as the officers saw this they did the same; the men looked on in surprise for a few moments and then forgetting how tired they were, all went to work with a will and soon conquered their difficulties. So Christ not only described true religion, but lived it, and epitomized Christianity in two words, 'Follow me.'"

Uncle Will: "The apostles came not alone for their own salvation, but to help Christ save the world. But they are dead. Mabel, Frank and Christina, who do you think are their successors?" It was expected that the children would say, "The preachers," with the usual tendency to turn all Christian work over to them; but Christina said, "I'll be one to help Jesus."

"You shall, indeed," said Uncle Will. "I have some leaflets about Sabbath-keeping for another neighborhood tour of my little bicycle couriers to-morrow. And let us all, as we go about thinking of our harvests, be Andrews and Philips, to bear to our neighbors at least some fragment of the Gospel, in print, if not in word. Miss Havergal reminds us how beautiful are the feet that go on such errands:

'Not unto all the tuneful lips are given
The ready tongue, the words so strong and sweet;
Yet all may turn with humble, willing feet,
And bear to darkened souls the light from heaven.'"

What the Christian Nations Need to Guide Them

WHEN John Bright spoke in the House of Commons on the question whether the United States was likely to subjugate Canada, he closed with this paragraph:

"We have experience, beacons, landmarks enough. It is true that we have not, as had an ancient people, Urim and Thummim — those oracular gems on Aaron's breast from which to take counsel. But we have the unchangeable and eternal principles of the moral law to guide us. And only so far as we walk by that guidance, can we be permanently a great nation, or a happy people."

This was good advice for Great Britain then: it is good advice for her and for the United States at this moment. Nations have no life beyond this world. They have to be judged here: here receive the penalty of their mistakes and misdeeds. The nations that have perished from the face of the earth have been the nations that have forgotten God, and broken the law of God. This is what the Psalmist means when he speaks of a nation's being cast into hell. All the cities that represent ancient civilization have, more or less, experienced that fate. And if any of them are recovering from it, it is because they have begun to remember God.

To Safeguard the Family

THE value which Jehovah put upon training in the family is shown in this language: "And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down and when thou risest up." The things to be thus taught, line upon line and precept upon precept, at home, in the street, on retiring to bed, and on rising in the morning, are God's "commandments, statutes and judgments;" in other words, the institutions, the sanctions and the history through which God had unfolded himself to his chosen people. Bible-study, Sunday School work, preaching by pastors, excellent as they are, are not to set aside or supersede this parental interest, this parental training. Family worship even is no substitute for it.

The family, as instituted for the preparation of children for their life-work is, of late, more and more emphasized. The maintenance of the Church, and the organizations and societies connected with the Church and kindred to it, this used to be regarded the great work. But, lately, Christian people have come to see that the family is endangered even by excessive devotion to Church-life. How many good people would gladly have back again their scattered children in the old familiar grouping, with their young and tender hearts so susceptible to religious truth! For, if the family goes, everything else is endangered. The Church, the State must go. Every man who looks after his family builds over against his own house. So all the breaches may be repaired.

College Traditions

COLLEGE traditions have come down from the age of barbarism. They are mediaeval. College faculties in these days have to create new traditions. This is a part of the college problem. It is no longer the period of hazing and rude pranks perpetrated on honest citizens. It is the period of the enfranchisement and college life of woman. Woman must hereafter be reckoned as a part of the tradition of college life. Not woman as a creature of society, but woman as a competitor for mental and moral triumphs: woman as a humanizing influence in college social life.

Many a time you have heard as an apology for the misdemeanors of college students: "Well, boys will be boys." In these days, boys are becoming gentlemen even in college. It is a bad mark, that a Christian civilization fixes to a college, where coarse and brutal tricks and pranks are allowed. We do not want to repeat here the college life of Germany, where so many students bear the marks of duels and drinking bouts. God made even boys in his own image. And it is a boy's duty to remember the words of the Apostle, "Whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are of good report, think on these things."

Prison Labor

LARGE amounts of work done in prison have been put upon the market at prices so cheap as to damage the labor outside the prisons. It does not seem to us that prison labor ought to have power to hurt honest labor. There are some styles of industry almost ruined by this competition of the work of the prisons, for prison labor is always cheaper, as the toilers in penitentiary have their clothing and board free of charge. Great changes are needed. Let the legislatures regulate these matters. Let the State, by the labor of convicts, first pay itself for the expense of keeping these offenders and then let the surplus that any inmate earns go to his family. It is not right that the State or Christian charity be required to support the families of these convicts. Compel the man in prison to pay his own board to the State and also to support the helpless wife and children outside the prison. It is a grand thing to keep all the prisoners at work, for it is best for their health and their morals, and let the legislature regulate the work accomplished there, first, so that it shall not hinder the trades outside by ruinous rivalry, and in the next place by making the criminal classes, after paying for their clothes and board to the State, support their families. Men outside the prisons are expected to support their households, and the commission of crime ought not to discharge them from this responsibility. We would have it so regulated that every Saturday night the families of the incarcerated should be at the prison gate and get what the husband or father has earned during the week in excess of what is necessary for his maintenance.

Know Your Own Mind

THE inability to make up the mind, to keep to one intention, and to regard our decisions as final, is a deplorable but very common failing. It may arise from too large an extent of choice; but is far more likely to be the result of a conscience made slippery by habitual neglect of its first admonitions; or else by that restless mental habit which

To-day wants "this" and to-morrow "that"
And the next day wants—it "knows not what."

In any case the result is obvious to all, for this irresolution is a fault that works in the open, and people who are inconvenienced, injured, and irritated by it, detect the slip which generally renders a life futile.

No one in the present era can afford to halt long between two opinions. The world moves too fast, and situations change too rapidly to wait while wavering, vacillating people make up their mind. And while they wait and hesitate, accident—or some unknown person—very likely settles the matter without any regard to their credit or interest. They had the option of taking a certain step; they let the fortunate moment slip by, and are driven to take another course, which very likely is not fortunate because not taken at the right time. Thus irresolute people shilly-shallying with events are really rash people, for their excessive caution makes them finally act on the spur of the moment. A simple and very common illustration of this temper may be seen in an irresolute woman choosing a dress—she hesitates and wavers until she has worn out both herself and the seller, and then, hurried and tired, invariably selects the one least desirable.

Another fault of the irresolute is that they hardly ever keep their promises. They make promises but they have the habit of considering nothing settled that can be changed. It is this mental fibre that is at the bottom of all decent jilting, for the irresolute party has no sooner committed him or herself to a definite course than they realize they have done a tremendous thing, and then they begin to flounder and to assure themselves it is not irrevocable. And the thing that is told the consciousness often enough becomes a dominant thought, and what was at first the barest possibility grows at last to a certainty. The constant man or woman in the same position may have the same momentary panic, but they instantly rally from it, accept the situation they have created and turn deliberation into action.

Procrastinating people are irresolute people. To-day does not exist for them, nor for any resolve they make. They are going to do something good to-morrow, next week, next month, next year, sometime. But the good they ought to do at the present time is not better done by waiting—is perhaps not done at all. And as much of the comfort of social and domestic life depends on our being able to take for granted things will happen at the promised and right time; a very slight variation from this rule can bring great annoyance. Have we not all become nervous and irritated at a visitor who is "going," but yet does not go. The pleasure of the call is over with the first intimation that the visit is finished; but the visitor hangs about, minute after minute, for no apparent reason, while our work is urging us to resume it. The pleasantest intercourse can be spoiled by such a procrastinating exit.

Take again the case of a man who has had his family preparing for a pleasure journey a whole week. They are ready to start, but he vacillates and puts off, and finally, when every one has lost the desire for a change so uncertain, he takes offence at some word of disappointment, and orders the move instantly, though the weather is unfavorable and mother has a headache. In contemplating such provoking people, we may well admire Horace Walpole's self-complacency over the fact that he "arrived at Lee on the day and hour promised Mr. Barrett; returned to London on the day and hour promised himself, and was back home as punctually on his promise to Strawberry. And," he says, "in this there was nothing extraordinary, as I have always had the felicity of knowing my own mind"—a very different person from the Scotchman's definition of an opposite character: "an irresolute, squeezable, boneless lad, wha' couldna tak' care o' himsel'."

Irresolution in spiritual matters is the fatal mistake. Who can measure the distance between those whose spiritual minds are all nebulous, without strength of coherence, and those whose religious convictions have no loose ends, and who know positively in whom and in what they believe. The first, in opposition to the exhortation to be able to "give a reason for the faith they profess," can give no reason for anything they believe—or fancy they believe. Their vague, vapory credo may even be vitally wrong, but if reasoned with they begin at once to flounder, for they have not an inch of firmly laid foundation on w to rest their opinions. On the contrary, m of decision and constancy cannot be sw about with every wind of doctrine; they l a sure foundation; they have confidence, therefore peace in believing.

Acknowledging their weakness, what shall the Irresolute do? Regret for this h is useless; promises amount to nothing, un they are sternly and inflexibly redeemed. this redemption of promises lies the first g remedy, for the self-control that enables u rule our destiny—to will and to do good d —is not a gift, nor is it ever suddenly acqui It is a good habit, learned through ste persevering training, with a conscious dep ence on him who "helpeth all our infirmiti

If we determine to do whatever we say will do, and to give whatever we promis give; if we do a thing at the precise time arranged to do it, we put life within limitat and limitation always makes for happin and we may remember this simple fact: t if a man says he will do a certain thing twelve o'clock and he does it at that hour is a better man than if he did it at ten min past twelve. To accomplish this straightr of aim and execution will doubtless be a h fight; but then life is given us, not to be joyed, but to be overcome.

In this fight we can have little help f outsiders; in fact, in all moral and spirit conflicts we stand alone, so far as fellow c tures are concerned. And where our own is likely to fail us, we must go boldly for h to him who has pledged his word to help infirmities—go boldly, not waveringly or do ingly, as uncertain both of our own desires of God's good pleasure to give us our desir but sure and certain that God's promises "yea and amen!" For faith is in spiritual m ters all that courage is in material affairs, creates its own verification. With such div help no one need despair. We are nearer God than to our father and mother. We never come of age with God; never grow of our dependence on him; never leave home of his right hand. His strength is strength. His ear lies close to our lips; it never taken away; we sigh into it even w we sleep and dream.

The War in . . . . South Africa

ANOTHER week of anxiety for Great Britain has passed comparatively uneventfully. Some relief to the suspense was afforded by the news of the arrival of Gen. Roberts and Gen. Kitchener on the scene of nflict. There is now a prevalent feeling at the worst weakness exposed by the ar—that of the strategic incapacity of e commanders—may now be remedied the two famous generals. Up to the ose of the second week of January no rther serious assaults had been made Ladysmith, from which we infer that e repulse must have proved even more stly to the Boers than to the British. he fighting was evidently of a desperate aracter. One position was captured by e Boers three times during the day, om which they were as many times ected. Another position which they ptured and held during the day they ere compelled to abandon at nightfall. en. Buller, who did not avail himself of e opportunity of making an attack on e Boers, while they were weakened by e attack on Ladysmith, has at last ley. His disaster at Magersfontein, is said to have impaired the confidence of his officers in his ability. It is now reported that his decision upon the plan of battle on that day was taken in opposition to his officers, who warned him that a terrible slaughter was inevitable and success was probably impossible. A rumor that Methuen will be superseded is prevalent. The gravity of the situation on all sides is by no means diminished, and there is a widespread dread that the next news, whether it be of victory or of defeat, will bring sadness into many homes, both rich and poor, for it is likely to be news of many a precious life sacrificed. It may be hoped that the horrors of war thus brought home to the people on both sides of this awful conflict will lead to greater reluctance in all nations in the future to ade a movement toward the relief of e beleaguered garrison. He has sent a rt of his force to the west and has ized and held Potgeiter's Drift, which apparently a ford of the Tugela river. nother part of his force was despatched der Gen. Warren to the east. From is it is inferred that he intends making multaneous attempts in three places to oss the river. He is certain to meet fierce sistance and will have to fight probably e most critical battle of the war. It ould appear that the garrison at Ladynith are hopeful of the result, for the gnificant news comes, from a correspondt in the town, that increased rations e being served, which implies that imediate relief is expected, and there is erefore no further need to husband eir resources In the southwest, Gen. rench appears to be showing the greatt activity. He is pushing back the inders on his right and on his left, and is displayed more strategic skill than ny other British General. Even he, owever, has had to send one of the "reet" dispatches, with which the ritish public has become so unpleasntly familiar. In a severe skirmish near olesberg, he lost eleven officers and bout one hundred and fifty men, the ajority of whom were taken prisoners. en. Methuen had maintained his posion on the Modder River, but had made o advance toward the relief of Kimberresort to arms for the settlement of international disputes.

When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble, whether it be done against a nation or against a man only? (Job 34:29).

Firemen Overcome

An extraordinary fire occurred in West Fifty-ninth street, New York, on January 10th, which caused the prostration of more than fifty firemen. The fire started in the basement of a four-story building and soon made its presence known by the volumes of dense smoke which poured forth. When the firemen arrived in response to the alarm, several entered the basement to ascertain where the fire was. The noxious black smoke which filled the room speedily overcame them. Some staggered out and fell on the sidewalk, while others had to be dragged out. Some were in so critical a state that they were sent at once to a hospital. The calls for more firemen alarmed the chief, who went in person to take charge. He ordered the flooring of the room above the basement chopped up. When this was done a tongue of flame shot up and the cause of the dense smoke was discovered. Between the ceiling of the basement and the floor of the room above there was a space filled with tarred building felt which had caught fire from a defective flue and was smouldering in the confined space. The chief said that such fires were more difficult to fight than those that blazed. Christian workers have that experience in analogous circumstances. An open, flagrant wrongdoer is easier to reach with the Gospel offer of salvation, than the decent, respectable sinner, whose life is outwardly irreproachable, but is in secret smouldering with the fires of evil passions. Christ addressed such in his day with the warning:

Verily I say unto you, that the publicans and harlots go into the Kingdom of God before you (Mat. 21:31).

A Fortune in a Book

An astonishing discovery is reported from a small town in Indiana. For many years past it has been the habit of a manager of the principal hotel there, to store in the basement any property left in the hotel by the guests, as well as any discarded articles of furniture. The room had recently become so full, with the accumulation of years, that it was necessary to clean it out, and the manager went down to examine the property. Among the miscellaneous articles turned over was an old book on the subject of theology. It was thrown aside as worthless, but before consigning it to the ash-barrel he gave it a shake. To his astonishment a bill for one hundred dollars fluttered to the ground. He then examined the book more carefully and found that the owner of it had used it as a bank. There were between the leaves, bills of various denominations, including two of one thousand dollars and one of five hundred dollars. There was no clue to the ownership of the book nor to the date when it was left at the hotel. It was an extraordinary and most unlikely place in which to find so large a sum of money. The finder is doubtless very glad that he did not throw it away, as he at first was disposed to do, without examination. How many people there are who have even greater reason to rejoice that they have searched the Book of Books, in which they have found a treasure outweighing in value all the money in the world!

Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life (John 5:39).

A Total Wreck

A pitiable spectacle was witnessed in St. Mary's Bay, Newfoundland, on Jan. 11. Not more than a quarter of a mile from shore, a large steamer was perishing from fire and water, and no one could go to the rescue of the people on board. About midnight, the vessel had been seen entering the bay during a heavy snowstorm. The next that was seen of her was in the dawn, when, her bows stove in from collision with a rock and her stern burning fiercely, she was sinking beneath the waves. Three men could be seen on the bridge, and one was in the rigging and they were signalling to the shore for help, but in such a storm as was then raging, no boat could hope to live, and there was no rocket apparatus at hand by which a rope could be thrown. It is supposed that the vessel caught fire at sea, and the captain making a run for the nearest land struck a rock at the entrance to the bay. The name of the steamer was not ascertained before she sank, but it will doubtless be learned by the divers. It is supposed that she was a German oil or tank steamer, possibly the Helios, which, being on her way from New York to Flushing, would be in the neighborhood of St. John's about the time of the wreck. It is believed that all on board must have perished, but as yet it is not known how many there were. How eagerly those people would have welcomed a boat sent to bring them off in safety. It would not have been necessary to urge them to accept salvation, as it is to urge people who are in danger of eternal disaster, who might be saved through Christ.

We are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God (II. Cor. 5:20)

A Heroic Physician

A New Orleans physician has given to the press one of the most thrilling stories of heroism ever related in medical history. It is that of a practitioner in Vienna, who had been studying the Bubonic plague, which has worked such awful havoc in India during the past two years. Dr. Franz Mueller, a young man on the threshold of a brilliant scientific career, devoted himself to the discovery of a remedy for it. In the course of his study he contracted the malady from the bacilli in "culture tubes" and when he became certain that he was infected, he immediately locked himself in an isolated room and posted a message on the window pane, reading thus: "I am suffering from plague. Please do not send a doctor to me, as, in any event, my end will come in four or five days." A number of his associates were anxious to attend him, but he refused to admit them, and died alone, within the time he predicted. He wrote a farewell letter to his parents, placed it against the window, so it could be copied from the outside, and then burned the original with his own hands, fearful it might be preserved and carry out the mysterious germ. Seldom has any one displayed so much concern for the safety of others, as to deliberately renounce the comforts of friendly ministration in the last crisis of life, lest loved ones might suffer. We can admire such self-sacrifice even though we listen unmoved to the infinitely greater example of that spirit in him who gave his life to save our souls from death.

He saved others: himself he cannot save (Matt. 27:42).

The Pacific Voyage Begun

ROBERT STRONG wuz touched to his heart, I see he wuz, but kep' up, his nater bein' such. Miss Meechim and Dorothy wuz walkin' a little ahead, Tommy between 'em. And anon we come to the house

"AFTER GETTIN' TOMMY TO BED."

Robert lived in; not a bit better than the others on that street, but a nice, comfortable structure of gray stun and brick, good enough for anybody, with wide sunshiny windows, fresh air, sunshine, plenty of books, musical instruments and furniture good enough, but nothing for show.

Here his motherly-looking housekeeper spread a nice lunch for us. His overseer dined with us, a good-looking chap, devoted to Robert Strong, as I could see, and ready to carry out his idees to the full. Miss Meechim couldn't find anything, it seemed to me, to pick flaws in, but she did say to me out to one side, "Just think how Robert lives in a house no better than his workmen, and he might live in a palace."

Sez I, warmly, "Robert Strong's body may stay in this comfortable brick house, good enough for anybody, but the real Robert Strong dwells in a royal palace, his soul inhabits the temple of the Lord, paved with the gold and pearl of justice and love, and its ruff reaches clear up into heaven from where he gits the air his soul breathes in."

"Do you think so? I never thought of it in that light; I have thought his ideas was erroneous and so my clergyman thinks. Rev. Dr. Weakdew said to me there were a great many texts that he had preached from all his life, that if these ideas of Robert's was carried out universally, would be destroyed and rendered meaningless. Texts it had always been such a comfort to him to preach from, he said, admonishing the poor of their duty to the rich, and comforting the poor and hungry and naked with assurances that though hungry here they may partake of the bread of life above, if they are humble and patient and endure to the end, and though shivering and naked here, they may be clothed in garments of light above."

And I sez, "Bein' that we are all in this world at present, I believe the Lord would ruther we should cover the naked limbs and feed the starvin' bodies here, and now, and leave the futur to Him."

But Miss Meechim shook her head sadly. "It sounds well," sez she, "but there is something wrong in any belief that overthrows Scripture and makes the poor wealthy."

"Well," sez I, "if it wuz our naked backs that the snow fell on, and the hail peited, and our stomachs that wuz achin' and faint for food, we should sing a different tune."

"I trust that I should sing a Gospel tune in any event," sez she.

"Well," sez I, "we needn't quarrel about that, for we couldn't feel much like singin' in them cases. But if we did sing I think a good hymn would be:

Blest be the tie that binds
Our hearts in Christian love.

"And if the rich and poor, Capital and Labor would all jine in and sing this from the heart, the very winders of heaven would open to hear the entrancin' strains," sez I. But I don't spoze I changed her mind any.

Dorothy bein' natcrally so smart, wuz impressed by all we had seen, I could see she wuz, and when he wuzn't lookin' at her I could see her eyes rest on Robert Strong's face with a new expression of interest and approval. But she wuz full of light, happiness and joy—as she ort to be in her bright youth—and she and Robert and Miss Meechim spoke of the trip ahead on us with happy anticipations.

But I—oh, that deep, holler room in my heart into which no stranger looked; that room hung with dark, sombry black; remembrances of him the great ocean wuz a-goin' to sever me from—he on land and I on sea—ten thousand miles of land and water goin' to seperate us; how could I bear it, how wuz I goin' to stand it? I kep' up, made remarks and answered 'em mekanically, but oh, the feelin's I felt on the inside. How little can we tell in happy lookin' crowds how many of the gay throng hear the rattle of their own private skeletons above the gayest music!

"HIS MOTHERLY HOUSEKEEPER SPREAD LUNCH"

At the Palace Hotel

Well, we got home to the Palace hotel in good season, I a-talkin' calmly and cheerfully, but sayin' in the inside, "'Mid pleasures and palaces though we may roam, be it ever so humbly there is no place like home." My home wuz my pardner, the place where he wuz would look better than any palace.

I went up to my bed and after gettin' Tommy to bed, who wuz cross and sleepy, I finished the letter to my help, for we wuz goin' to start in the mornin'.

"Oh Philury!" the letter run, "my feelin's, you cannot parse 'em, even if you wuz better grounded in grammar than I think you be. Not one word from my beloved pardner do I hear, is Josiah dead?" sez I. "But if he is don't tell me; I could not survive, and Tommy has got to be went with. But oh! if sickness and grief for me has bowed that head, bald, but most precious to me, deal with him as you would deal with a angel unawares. Bile his porridge, don't slight it or let it be lumpy, don't give him dishwatery tea, brile his toast and make his beef tea as you would read chapters of scripter—carefully and not with eye service. Hang my picter on the wall at the foot of the bed, and if it affects him too much, hang my old green braize veil over it, you'll find it in the hall cupboard."

But why should I sadden and depress the hearts of a good natered public? I writ seven sheets of foolscap, and added to what I had already writ, it made it too big to send by mail, so I put it in a collar box and sent it by express, charges paid, for I knew the dear man it wuz addressed to, if he wuz still able to sense anything would like it better that way. And then my letter sent off I begun to pack my hair trunk anew.

Preparing for the Voyage

Well, the day dawned gloriously. I spoze I must have slep' some, for when I opened my eyes I felt refreshed. Tommy wuz awake in his little bed and "wonnerin'" at sunthin' I spoze, for he always wuz, and breakfast was partook of by the hull party, for Robert Strong had come with a big carriage to take us to the ship and took breakfast with us, and soon, too soon for me, we stood on the wharf, surrounded by a tumultous crowd, goin' every which way; passengers goin', visitors comin', and officials from the ship goin' about tending to everything; trunks and baggage being slammed down and then anon being run onto the ship, Miss Meechim's, Dorothy's and Robert Strong's baggage piled up on one side on us and I carefully keepin' watch and ward over a small-sized hair trunk, dear to me as my apples in my eyes, because every inch on it seemed to me like a sooveneer of that dear home I might never see agin.

As I stood holdin' Tommy by the hand and keepin' eagle watch over that tru how much did that big ship look lik big monster that wuz agoin' to tear heart all to pieces, tearin' my body fr the ground that kep' my pardner on bosom. Tears that I could not restr dribbled down my Roman nose and o my gray alpacky waist; Dorothy see and slipped her kind little ha into mine and soothed my ago by gently whisperin':

"HE HELD BOTH MY HANDS IN HIS'N

"Maybe you'll get a letter fr him on the ship, Aunt Sam tha."

An Unexpected Visitor

Well, the last minute come, t hair trunk had been tore from side, and I, too, had to lea terry firmy, whisperin' to mys words that I'd hearn, sligh changed: "Farewell my Josia and if forever, still forever f thee well." My tears blinded so I could only jest see Tomm who I still held hold of. reached the upper deck wi falterin' steps. But lo as I sto there wipin' my weepin' eyes the him sez, I hearn sunthin' th rung sweetly and clearly on ears over all the conflicti sounds and confusion on sh and shore, and that brung me wi wildly beatin' heart to the si of the ship.

"Samantha! stop the shi wait for me! I am comin'!"

Could it be? Yes it wuz n own beloved pardner, mad racin' down the wharf, swingi his familiar old carpet satchel his hand, also huggin' in his arr a big bundle done up in newsp per, which busted as he reached the wate edge, dribblin' out neck ties, bandan handkerchiefs, suspenders, cookies, a the dressin' gown with tossels.

He scrambled after 'em as well as could in his fearful hurry, and his arn bein' full, he threw the dressin' gow round his shoulders and madly raced ov the gang plank, still emitting that agoni ing cry: "Samantha, wait for me! st the ship!" which he kep' up after I h advanced onward and he held both n hands in hisen.

Oh, the bliss of that moment! No ang hand, no reporter even for the New Yo papers could exaggerate the blessedne of that time, much as they know abo aggeration. Tears of pure joy ran down th our faces, and all the sorrows of the st seperation seemed to dissolve in a lden mist that settled down on every-ing round us and before us. The land oked good, the water looked good, the y showered down joy as well as sun-ine; we wuz together once more. We d no need of speech to voice our joy. t anon Josiah did say in tremblin' ents as he pressed both my hands rmly in hisen: "Samantha, I've me!" And I, too, sez in a voice trem-in' with emotion:

"Dear Josiah, I see you have." And en I sez tenderly as I helped him off th the dressin' gown: "I thought you id you couldn't leave the farm, Josiah."

"Well, I wuz leavin' it; I wuz dyin'; thought I might as well leave it one ay as t'other. I couldn't live without ou, and finally I ketched up what clothes could in my hurry and sot out, thinkin' ebby I could ketch you in Chicago. ou see I have got my dressin' gown and enty of neckties."

Arvilly Joins the Party

"Well," sez I in my boundless joy and ontent, "there are things more necessary h a long sea voyage than neckties, but 've got some socks most knit, and I n buy some underclothes, and we will t along first rate." "Yes, Arvilly id so." Sez he, "Arvilly told e you'd manage."

"Arvilly?" sez I, in surprised cents.

"Yes, Arvilly concluded to come o. She said that if you hadn't arted so quick she should ave come with you. But hen she found out I was omin' she jest set right off ith me. She's brung along at book she's agent for, The win Crimes of America: ntemperance and Greed. She inks she can most pay her ay sellin' it. She jest stopped n the wharf to try to sell a opy to a minister. But here e is." And, sure enough, e that wuz Arvilly Lanfear dvanced, puttin' some money her pocket, she had sold er book. Well, I wuz surprised, but glad, r I pitied Arvilly dretfully for what she ad went through, and liked her. Two assengers had gin up goin' at the last inute or they couldn't have got tickets.

I advanced towards her and sez: "Ar-illy Lanfear! or she that wuz, is it you?"

"Yes, I've come, and if ever a human reeter come through sufferin' I have. Vhy, I've been agent for The Wild leeds of Men for years and years, but I ever knew anything about 'em till I come n this tower. I thought that I should ever git that man here alive. He has ep' and wailed the hull durin' time for ear we shouldn't ketch you."

"Oh, no, Arvilly!" sez the joyous-look-n' Josiah.

"I can prove it!" sez she, catchin' out is red and yeller bandanna handkerchief om his hat, where he always carries it: Look at that, wet as sop!" sez she, as she eld it up. It wuz proof, Josiah said no ore.

"I knew we should ketch you, for I knew you would stop on the way. I thought I would meet you at the deepo to surprise you. But I had to bank my house; I wuzn't goin' to leave it to no underlin' and have my stuff freeze. But when I hern that Josiah wuz comin' I jest dropped my spade—I had jest got done—ketched up my book and threw my things into my grip, my trunk wuz all packed, and, here I am, safe and sound, though the cars broke down once and we wuz belated. We have just traipsed along a day or two behind you all the way from Chicago, I not knowin' whether I could keep him alive or not."

Sez I fondly, "What devoted love!"

"What a natural fool!" sez Arvilly. "Did it make it any better for him to cry and take on? That day we broke down and had to stop at a tarven I wuz jest mad enough, and writ myself another chapter on The Wild Deeds of Men, and am in hopes that the publisher will print it. It will help the book enormously I know. How you've stood it with that man all these years, I don't see; rampin' round, tearin' and groanin' and actin'. He didn't act no more like a perfessor than —than Captain Kidd would if he had been travelin' with a neighborin' female, pursuin' his wife, and that female doin' the best she could for him. I kep' tellin' him that he would overtake you, but I might as well have talked to the wind—a equinoctial gale," sez she. Josiah wuz so happy her words slipped offen him without his sensin' 'em and I wuz too happy to dispute or lay anything up, when she went on and sez:

"I spoze that folks thought from our jawin' so much that we wuz man and wife; and he a yellin' out acrost the sleeper and kinder cryin', and I a hollerin' back at him to "shet up and go to sleep!" It is the last time I will ever try to carry a man to his wife; but I spozed when I started with him, he bein' a perfessor, that he would act different!"

"SAMANTHA, STOP THE SHIP! WAIT FOR ME!"

Anticipations of Travel

"Well," sez I, in a kind of a soothin' tone, "I'm real glad you've come, Arvilly; it will make the ship seem more like Jonesville, and I know what you have went through."

"Well," sez she, "no other livin' woman duz unless it is you." She kep' on thinkin' of Josiah, but I waved off that idee; I meant her tribulations in the army. And I sez, "You may as well spend your money travelin' as in any other way."

"Yes, I love to travel when I can travel with human creeters, and I might as well spend my money for myself as to leave it for my cousins to fight over, and I can pay my way mostly sellin' my book; and I've left my stuff so it won't spile."

"Where is Waitstill Webb?" sez I.

"Oh, Waitstill has gone back to be a nurse—she's gone to the Philippines."

Sez I gladly, "Then we shall see her, Arvilly."

"Yes," sez she, "and that wuz one reason that I wanted to go, though she's acted like a fool, startin' off agin to help the govermunt. I've done my last work for it, and I told her so: I sez, if see the govermunt sinkin' in a mud hole I wouldn't lift a finger to help it out. I meant to go to the Paris Exposition, and I always wanted to see China and Japan, but never spozed I should."

Out on the Great Waters

"It is a strange Providence, indeed, Arvilly, that has started us both from Jonesville to China. But," sez I, "let me make you acquainted with the rest of our party," and I introduced 'em. Josiah wuz embracin' Tommy and bein' embraced, and he had seen 'em all but Robert Strong.

In a few minutes the great ship begun to breathe hard, as if tryin' to git up strength for the move, and kinder shook itself, and gin a few hoarse yells, and sot off, seemin' to kinder tremble all over with eagerness to be gone. And so we sot sail, but ship and shore and boundless water all looked beautiful and gay to me. What a change, what a change from the feelin's I had felt; then the cold spectral moonlight of loneliness rested on shore and Golden Gate, now the bright sun of love and happiness gilded 'em with their glorious rays, and I felt well. Well might Mr. Drummond say, "Love is the greatest thing in the world." And as I looked on my precious pardner I bethought fondly, no matter how little a man may weigh by the steelyards, or how much a Arvilly may make light on him, if Love is enthroned in his person, he towers up bigger than the hull universe. And so, filled with joy radiatin' from the presence of the best beloved, and under the cloudless sunshine of that glorious day, I set out on my Trip Abroad. Yes, I wuz once more embarked on that great watery world that lays all round the continents, and we can't help ourselves.

The Unnoticed Bound

IN passing southward, I may cross the line Between the Arctic and the Atlantic ocean.
I may not know by any test of mine—
By any startling signs or strange commotion
Across my track.

But as the days grow brighter, one by one—
And e'en the icebergs melt their hardened faces,
And sailors linger, basking in the sun—
I know I must have made the change of places
Some distance back.

Thus, answ'ring timidly my Master's call,
I passed the bourne of life in coming to him,
When in my love for him I gave up all;
The very moment that I thought I knew him
I cannot tell.

But, as increasingly I feel his love,
As this cold heart is melted to o'erflowing—
And now so clear the light comes from above—
I wonder at the change, but move on, knowing
That all is well.

Gospel Need in Lumber Camps

Isolation of Lumbermen—Life in a Logging Camp—Work of the Lumbermen's Evangelistic Association

THE lumber business ranks to-day in the forefront of the great industries of the world. Our forefathers lived in log huts, mud houses or tents, and not until the advent of the lumberman and the saw mill were our beautiful homes and churches made possible. During the early years of logging, woodsmen were compelled to undergo many hardships that in later years have been materially decreased. The physical comfort of the men is well looked after; employers have discovered that good food and warm bedding make more profitable labor. In most cases men are much better fed in the woods than in their own homes. They come out of the woods in the Spring fat, robust and hearty. Only their souls are neglected. The Christian Church of the United States has gone far toward fulfilling our Lord's command, "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature," but it is a singular fact that this great field right at our own door has been almost overlooked. Over half a million of men are employed in the lumber woods of this country—by far the largest unevangelized field in America.

The woodsmen are in camp, away from home, from five to seven months at a time. During this period they live in log houses built for the occasion. In one large room, which constitutes their winter home, will be crowded from sixty to one hundred and twenty men; and here their time is spent when not working. Around the wall on at least two sides is a double tier of bunks in which they sleep. A large stove and sometimes a table, constitutes the furniture of the "home." Here the men gather after the hard day's work. They divest themselves of their mackinaws, jackets and mittens, to which the snow and ice are clinging, and hang them near the red-hot stove to dry; then each man takes out his pipe and begins smoking. Imagine the atmosphere of that room! While away from the refining influences of home and civilization, Satan seems to have complete control; and profanity and questionable songs and stories are far too much the rule. There is little wonder that when lumbermen go to town they frequent saloons and other evil resorts. And thus, in cities and towns, the woodsman has established a reputation for evil. He does not attend the churches, neither is he found in the mission rooms of the Y. M. C. A. or the W. C. T. U. headquarters when in town. If we wish to do anything for these men, we must go to them in their camps in the woods, for they will not come to us.

The Lumbermen's Evangelistic Association was organized a little over three years ago. It has for its sole object the evangelization of lumbermen. Last winter eleven evangelists were sent to the logging camps of the north; and the present winter the Association hopes to send out at least twenty. Each evangelist has charge of from ten to twenty camps, traveling on foot from camp to camp, and speaking every evening. In this way he becomes personally acquainted with the men, and is thereby better able to influence them for good. While it is true that the woodsmen will not come to hear the Gospel, it is also true that when it is taken to them they give most respectful and earnest attention. In these "camp" meetings many men listen to the story of the Gospel for the first time. Others say they have not been inside of a church for ten, fifteen, or twenty years. In a meeting last winter in a camp of seventy, when one of the evangelists spoke on the love of God, it seemed to be a new thought to the hearers that any one loved them. The work as carried on by the Lumbermen's Evangelistic Association is not expensive, the cost per camp for the entire winter being from twenty to twenty-five dollars. Any inquiries sent to A. D. Cafferty, General Superintendent of the Lumbermen's Evangelistic Association, 1411 Elizabeth avenue, Marinette, Wis., will receive prompt attention.

Help for India's Sufferers

Urgent Need of Missionary and Christian Workers in India of Funds to Feed the Starving Multitude

WITH much pleasure we acknowledge the receipt of many contributions to the fund for the relief of the famine-stricken people of India. The prompt and generous response to our appeal, shows that the Proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was justified in believing that its readers would wish immediate aid to be given, and was safe in anticipating their gifts. The five thousand dollars which, as announced last week, Dr. Klopsch cabled to the missionaries, must have cheered their hearts and encouraged them to enter with confidence on their Christ-like work of feeding the starving. Their letters coming to this office by every mail, show how welcome would be the assurance this remittance would give, that the Christian people of America would stand by them in the crisis and provide them with the means of proving to the people the practical helpfulness of the religion of Christ. They describe a situation which gives cause for anxiety. Their incomes, which under the most favorable circumstances, barely suffice for their unavoidable expenses, must now bear the strain of food at famine prices. But how much more severe must be the strain upon these who, with a noble faith in God's providence, undertook the support of children orphaned in the famine of 1897! To those missionaries the sudden rise in the price of food involves a problem they know not how to solve. So far from being able to feed the destitute people who appeal to them by hundreds, they have to struggle hard to keep the wolf from their own doors.

Among the workers most seriously affected by the calamity, is Pandita Ramabai, who has more than three hundred widows and orphans depending on her for their daily bread. On this page is a photograph recently taken of a part of this large family. Ramabai has a large heart and she has never been able to steel it against the appeal of a hungry child. She remembers the time when she too, wandered around a poor little orphan girl, looking for food. In her compassion she received all who sought refuge with her during the famine three years ago, and she is now hard pressed to maintain them. But her faith is still unwavering. Recently nearly two hundred hungry people came to her from a country district where the famine is especially severe, piteously begging her to help them. She took them all into a barn and there described to them her position, explaining to them that her reliance for food from day to day was on God alone, and then persuaded them to unite with her in an earnest supplication to him for help in the sore extremity. Happily a remittance from friends in England came to her in time not only to relieve their immediate necessity, but to give employment for a few weeks to such as were able to work.

During the past week a letter has arrived from Rev. C. B. Newton, of the Presbyterian Mission at Julundur City, North India. He writes: I was made the agent for distributing relief sent two years ago by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and I have now been commissioned by the Lodiana Mission to make an appeal to the people who so liberally helped us at that time. Hundreds of people have been coming into our northern province from Central India and Rajputana for two months past. They report an absolute failure of the crops there and the most utter destitution. There are many women and children among them, all looking terribly hungry. These gaunt refugees fill our streets and their piteous cries can be heard night and day. Our difficulties are increased by the rise in the price of food. The rates are now as high as they were in 1897, when the famine was most severe. I write by order of the Lodiana Mission, now holding its annual meeting, to ask if you will not once more come to our help by appealing to the charity and humanity of the Christian people of America. The need is very urgent. On behalf of the committee.

C. B. NEWTON.

It is unnecessary to add anything to Mr. Newton's pressing appeal. It tells its own sad story of helplessness in the face of appalling destitution. The Lodiana Mission will be included in the apportionment of our next remittance, which we trust will soon be in hand. Following are contributions received since our last week's acknowledgment:

. . A Difficult Text . .

(See First Page Illustration.)

EVEN the most learned students of the Bible have to scratch their heads once in a while over some parts of the divine revelation which we call the Bible. Indeed, it would be difficult to regard it as divine if it had no unfathomable depths. The carpenter in our picture has a quizzical look upon his face, and we fancy that he thinks he has snared the minister. The domnie will be honest enough to admit that the text is a puzzle, if it is so, and if the man upon the bench is honest the two may help each other to get at its meaning. At times God reveals the deep teaching of a text to some very simple people who seek his light upon it, while more scholarly minds are left to wonder and question. "How can a man be in the Spirit and the Spirit in the man at the same time?" asked an assuming sceptic of a poor negro, who could hardly read. "There's no difficulty about that," said the negro. "I put the poker in the fire and in a few minutes the fire will be in the poker." To reject the Bible on account of its difficulties would be as foolish as to give up eating fish or chicken because these articles of diet contain bones. Common sense will help us to interpret and enjoy the Bible

Harvesting the Rice in China

WHEN we run the white rice grains through our fingers, or watch the process of their swelling when the mass is cooking over our fires, it does not often occur to us that the rice industry means life itself to millions of our fellow creatures. In large portions of China, for example, rice forms the principal article of food for the swarming peasantry, their diet varied by a little fish now and then, or very occasionally by a fowl. Not one of us, in this land of plenty, has the faintest idea of the deep and grinding poverty, the continual and passing privations of some of those Oriental countries where, if the rice harvest fails, stark, gaunt famine is certain. A missionary lady was standing at her door one morning in Amoy, some years ago, and she saw passing on the street a neighbor with two beautiful little twin girls whom he was taking to market to sell. They were about eighteen months old, a most enchanting age; their mother had dressed them prettily according to her means, and they were to be sold to the highest bidder. When the man came home in the later day, my friend told me that he had with him not little bright-eyed daughters, but their price instead, namely, a string of fish, and a few lumps of charcoal, which he had received in exchange for them. Think of it, mother of little girls! The sheer poverty of the people is in part their excuse for holding so very cheaply the lives of their girl babies. Then, too, we must not overlook the fact that girls are not wanted in heathen homes, and that woman is not honored except where Christianity prevails. Ignorance and cruelty walk hand in hand.

The rice is sown in wet and swampy ground, and this soil is kept wet, if not by rains, by continual watching till the seed begins to spring up. We have large rice plantations in our own South, but the methods of working them are somewhat less primitive than those which in China have been handed down from father to son for generations. Men and women work together in the wet fields, and everything is done by hand, the scene when the grain is ripe being exceedingly picturesque. The threshing and winnowing come afterward, as with other grains. India, Japan and China are all largely dependent upon the harvesting of the rice for their comfort and prosperity—almost for their existence.

The Rev. Arthur H. Smith, of the American Board, for twenty-two years a missionary in China, in writing about the people, in his book entitled Chinese Characteristics, says: "The quality of Chinese patience, which to us seems the most noteworthy of all, is its capacity to wait without complaint, and to bear with calm endurance. It has been said that the true way to test the real disposition of a human being is to study his behavior when he is cold, wet and hungry." After commenting on the almost universal crossness of Anglo-Saxons when deprived of their dinner, this writer goes on to say that he once saw one hundred and fifty Chinamen who had expected to sit down and banquet themselves served at a feast, instead of which no food was offered them at all, and they were obliged to wait on the people who did eat the viands to which they had supposably a right. They were neither uncivil nor surly, but behaved with perfect and very gentle amiability, waiting for many hours before their time came, without a single murmur. For heathen, such deportment was certainly wonderful, and could hardly have been surpassed by Christians.

The Chinese need no "Don't Worry" Clubs, for as a nation they are philosophical, and worry is unknown among them. Drought, flood, failure of crops, famine, fail to shake their imperturbability. They seem to have an infinite capacity for patience.

When disaster comes, one sees vast hordes of mendicant travelers on the march in China, begging their way a thousand miles to some province where there is plenty. "When the floods have abated, the mendicant farmer returns to his home long enough to scratch a crack in the mud, while it is still too soft to bear the weight of an animal, and in the tiny rift he drops a little seed, and again goes on his devious way, begging a substance until his small harvest shall be ripe."

The people who do not believe in foreign missions have surely never taken to heart or studied deeply into the conditions of life in every clime where Jesus is unacknowledged and worshiped. Yet

> Jesus shall reign where'er the sun
> Doth his successive journeys run and when his empire is established, in its wake shall come blessedness, material prosperity, the enfranchisement of the fettered, and the coronation of the home.

CHINESE WOMEN HARVESTING THE RICE CROP

Muffs versus Pockets

They won't let us have pockets, the autocratic dressmakers who fashion our gowns; and while our sons and brothers walk off triumphantly with fourteen of these useful receptacles in every suit of clothes, we are indeed to be congratulated if we have so much as a single one in any accessible place. But we carry muffs, and a muff in these days is large enough to hold a number of what a little lad I know calls "contraptions." Added to this, a muff is the most perfect and delightful contrivance for keeping the hands warm which was ever invented. I remember a girl who used hers to keep her feet in when they were half frozen as she was learning to skate, but that was forty years ago, and it was a little hard on the muff. Persons who do not like muffs think that they confine the hands too much, and that they leave one no arm free to help herself if she slips. As, when one slips on the ice, the safe plan is usually to make the least possible resistance, and just let oneself go. That argument is rather a failure. Why should not men carry muffs, as they do in Russia, or why should they not wear overcoats with long, loose, warmly-lined sleeves which they might pull over their hands when they choose? For driving this would be an inconvenient fashion, but not for walking. Warm, thick, loosely-fitting gloves probably satisfy most men, but I commend muffs to their consideration as an improvement on what they have now.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—AMY DEAN. Say "Yes, please"; or, "No, Mrs. Smith." Politeness is based on common sense.

—EMILIE H. Make up that quarrel with your friend. Life is too short for quarrels. Ask her pardon.

—AUNT PRUDENCE thanks her friends for good receipts, some of which have been tried successfully in Aunt P's kitchen.

—JUSTICE. You are condemning the young man on hearsay evidence, which is not really evidence, strictly speaking. You are not quite fair yourself.

—FLORENCE BROWN. Aunt Patience admires freckles. They really enhance a girl's beauty, these little kisses of the sun. Don't worry about them, dear.

—LOUISE AND FRANK. Combine in giving your mother a present on her birthday. She will be hard to please if she does not like a soft breakfast shawl or a new rocking chair, both of which gifts have been in your thought.

—PAULINE. When in doubt, wait. Don't decide too soon. The maid is in a strange place and does not know your ways. She may improve if you bear with her. Did you ever read Mistress and Maid, by Miss Muloch? It tells how a very blundering maid was transformed by patient training into a real comfort.

—FATHER IN PERPLEXITY. Why in the world should you hesitate to ask your boy to forgive your ill-temper? You were to blame in scolding him when he had made a mistake; the more so that you did not wait to investigate the matter. A parent gains, not loses, by owning up when he is in the wrong. None of us is infallible. If anybody disagrees with Aunt Patience, let him or her speak.

—YOUNG MATRON. You need not be disturbed because your husband wishes you to invite a few friends to dinner. Do not be too ambitious. Have a simple, well-cooked meal, daintily served, and do not let yourself be flustered. The regulation formal dinner requires a number of courses, but as you do your own work, you should not attempt anything elaborate. I advise you to have roast turkey, with celery, cranberry sauce and pickles; mashed potatoes, boiled onions, and stewed tomatoes, with mince pie for dessert, and coffee at the end of the meal. By preparing some of it the day before, you can easily have a more extended menu. Soup is by no means a difficult thing to manage, and if you have a soup course and a salad course your dinner will be charming. Serve crisp crackers and cheese, any sort of the latter which you prefer, with your salad.

HOME

A WORLD of strife shut out, my dears,
A world of love shut in,
And that is what the home should be
In midst of care and din.

Beyond its doors the battle waged
To gain the daily bread;
Within, the wife with angel face,
The baby's sunny head.

Temptation often grim outside,
But strength the crown to win
In hours of prayer at eventide
The happy home within.

A world of strife shut out, my dears,
A world of peace and love,
And we shut in as in an ark,
With God's own light above.

Dear little home, our star of hope
Upon the roughest road,
The type of heavenly rest where God
Makes his divine abode.

Daughters-in-Law

"YOUR son 's your son till he marries a wife," says the old distich. So has it been from the dawn of history, where Rebecca moaned to Isaac, that if Jacob took a wife from the daughters of Heth, her life would do her no good, and she could not bear it. "I am weary of my life, because of the daughters of Heth!" she said, thinking of the rough Esau and the women who abode in his tent. Modern women there are not a few whose daughters-in-law are not altogether pleasing to them, having been brought up in a way opposed to their own, or bringing another element into the family; or, and this is the feeling usually at the bottom of the hostile sentiment, awakening jealousy because alienating the son from his people. "Your son 's your son till he marries a wife."

In Oriental lands, and in the strangely unhomelike manner of life which goes on under the skies of Asia, relations-in-law so far as the women are concerned, take precedence of blood relations. In every Eastern household the husband's mother reigns supreme. The young man brings his wife home to his mother, and she must thenceforth "forget her own people and her father's house." As a daughter, her childhood's home knows her no more. To return thither, in case her husband casts her off, which sometimes happens, is to incur the deepest disgrace. To return in widowhood is an unspeakable calamity. The husband's people want her, hoping that her children may all be sons, accepting from her every sort of service meanwhile, so that her lot is usually bitter, and at all events not exceptional in being so.

No wonder that Oriental women look wistfully across the breadth of the world, to envy the ease and peace of our domestic arrangements and the luxury of our home lives.

A Word to the Housekeeper

One of the most common pieces of carelessness in housekeeping is the leaving of articles on the stairs. A person is sweeping and going to another part of the house; she leaves her dustpan and brush on the stairway, and the next one coming downstairs naturally tumbles over it. Several years ago a young woman going on work for the Young Women's Christian Association, received entertainment in the house of some kind unknown friends. Her room had several doors. After changing her dress and freshening herself from the dust of her journey, she turned in the dusk of a late afternoon to answer the summons to tea. Opening the door which she supposed led into the hall, she stepped clear down a flight of twelve steps into the darkness of the cellar where she was afterward picked up unconscious. A long illness ensued. This incident points to another form of carelessness. Lock doors against unsuspected stairways.

THE TOUCHSTONE

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

CHAPTER XIII.

One Another's Burdens

AFTER parting from Mrs. Locke, Douglas walked on, thinking deeply. So then it appeared to be all settled. Caryl would marry Celia and thereby carry the vote of that village where everyone, without distinction of politics, would support the man who was to be "our Miss Ceelie's" husband. The contest was so close that the vote of one village might decide it, and so Caryl would be elected.

"It will be thought the right and inevitable thing for her," he said to himself almost despairingly. "Even these people who adore her will be more than satisfied; they will think her goodness suitably rewarded by a rich husband, and one who will not take her away from the place she loves. . . . It is a foregone conclusion, if Caryl wins his election and stays on here."

He walked on, faster and faster, as if trying to escape from the thought which came next, but it overtook him and forced itself into words:

"If I were to do what no doubt he thinks I have done already, and take some one into my confidence who would not be above making public capital out of private matter! . . . It has absolutely nothing to do with his fitness to represent them in Parliament, but the average voter is not capable of seeing that. . . . If it were judiciously made known that. . . . But what has he done, after all? Managed to make himself acceptable to a rich old man, and to reconcile himself to the possession of a few thousands that might in fairness have gone to some one else! There is no crime in that; but it might be put in a light that would cost him a few votes, and every one says that if, as a stranger here, he gets in at all, it will be by the smallest possible majority. Besides, it might well come round to her!"

There was no use in hurrying on now; the debate was fairly begun, and nothing else in the world seemed of much consequence till it was settled. Douglas had forgotten that he was on his way home, and that his landlady and his evening meal awaited him; though before he met Mrs. Locke he had been as hungry as a young man ought to be after a hard day's work. He leaned upon a gate, looking out with unseeing eyes over the summer landscape, and the debate went on as though two trained advocates were pleading alternately. One of them reminded him that it was despicable to say the words which would prevent his brother being elected; the other reminded him that if he kept silence, his brother might win not only the election, but Celia as his wife.

"He has taken away my birthright," Douglas muttered half aloud, "and he will take my blessing too—the only blessing that I care for! 'He has supplanted me these two times!'" That, and the plain confession to himself that the information he was tempted to give would—with the construction that would be put upon it—be neither more nor less than slander, seemed to have cleared his mind a little, but he was as far as ever from having resolved what to do.

He said to himself at last, when he was weary of hearing the two advocates state and re-state the case, that he would be guided by circumstances; which generally means that a man intends to wait and see whether the temptation will not be strong enough to carry him off his feet, and so give him later the excuse that he could not help himself. And with that he went home to his solitary dinner, and as he sat over it studied the views of both local papers as to the Liberal candidate's chances, and counted the days that had still to elapse before the election.

"We were talking of touchstones—this is mine!" was his last waking thought that night. "Martin Hamerton was right; it is all a question of self-interest, only the objects of interest vary. I grudged Caryl my uncle's money, and felt myself superior because it was no more than a passive grudge. Now he touches what I happen to care more about, and I am ready to pawn my honor—to sell my soul, almost—for the chance of being even with him: 'However we bear it out, we men are a little breed.'"

The next night when bedtime came Douglas took the key of the farmhouse door—a ponderous weight of ironmongery—with him, and went out into the scented summer night, which was more "gloaming" than "mirk." He was in no mood to sleep, and his dreams of the night before had not been pleasant enough to invite a repetition. A lover is not wholly miserable, whatever he may suppose himself to be, while the "spirit in his feet" can lead him within sight of his lady's chamber window, and he can, amid the scent of her roses, watch the light go out there, and wonder with awe and reverence whether possibly she has "set his graceless name in her pure prayers."

Douglas went through all the mournful delightful follies of those good days when lovers are so unhappy—days that in after-life some of them would buy back at almost any price that could be asked of them—and then, the Dower House having been dark and silent for more than half-an-hour, set out to walk off his remaining restlessness along the quiet deserted lanes.

He was not thinking or caring much which way he went, but as the clock in the church tower struck two he found himself returning through the village, and with a recollection of the day's work that lay before him and the need of getting a few hours of sleep before it, he took the short cut that led through the churchyard to strike the lane which would take him to High Ashes.

In that dimness, neither dark nor light, the tombstones could have been counted—the ponderous slabs of the villagers, the white marble cross that Squire Hamerton had put there in memory of his young wife, the mother of Martin and Celia, and his own memorial beside it.

Between those two graves there was something—a dark figure that moved, that slowly rose as if from crouching on the grass.

Douglas stopped short a moment, his heart giving an extra beat or two, and then moved forward to see who or what this might be.

The next instant he wished that he had done nothing of the kind, for to his dismay he recognized Martin Hamerton.

The first impulse of a reserved man under such a trial is always to do as he would be done by, to pretend that he had seen nothing and heard nothing, and to avoid any word that might seem to ask for confidence. But on second thoughts he sometimes remembers that other men are not necessarily like himself, and that if a friend may know what is amiss he may be able to give help, or at the least sympathy.

By the time Douglas had stammered out an almost meaningless phrase or two, meant to convey that he was not in the least surprised or anxious, and that it was the most natural thing in the world to find a man lying beside his father's grave at the dead of night, his common sense had come back, and he cut short Martin's halting attempt to reply in the same strain.

"Look here!" he said simply, "we need have no pretences with each other. I know well enough that a man doesn't roam about for half the night because things are going well with him. And I know that I ought to go home and go to bed, and I suspect it would be well for you to do the same. Let's make our way toward's home together; and if you could—if you wouldn't mind trying to tell me what the trouble is—you know how glad I should be if I could do anything."

Martin Hamerton gave a shaky little laugh, the laugh of a man who has been tried by loneliness and misery till at the first word of sympathy he could cry, if it were not for manhood.

"As for telling you what is amiss," Martin said at last, "I could do that. Not only because you are you, but just because you can't help me. In some circumstances to complain is to beg, and that hurts a man's pride, even though he feels that he might be driven to do it if it were any use. But since I know that you can do nothing, you know that I am asking nothing; and I may tell you just for the relief of telling. I have kept it to myself till I am nearly crazy."

"Tell me," said Douglas, gently. "But I wish it might prove that I could do something after all."

"Oh! it is a sufficiently sordid matter—money—the usual source of trouble," said Martin bitterly. "Only a rich man could help me, and I don't number so very many of those among my friends. To put the whole affair in a nutshell, unless I can find a large sum within a very few days I am liable to have my furniture seized, even down to my sister's jewels and our mother's portrait, and the Dower House sold over our heads. And dishonor, worse than ruin to follow."

"But how?—Excuse me! I have no right to question you, I know."

"Oh, I mean to tell you all particulars. They are safe with you, I know; and, as I said, I have gone over the whole thing to myself, and by myself, till it is driving me mad. I must speak out to some one, and rather to you than to any man I know . . . You know that my father ruined himself by rash speculation? and that when he died there was practically nothing left but my mother's small fortune: the Hall and such of the land as was not mortgaged beyond its value barely sufficed to pay his debts."

"I have heard that much, even before we had met."

"Well, I don't blame him for that. The land, which he understood, proved to be nothing to trust to, and he tried other things which he and those like him never did understand and never will, and he paid dearly for it. But after his death, when his affairs were, as I thought, all wound up, and Celia and I were beginning to see how we stood after the wreck, another claim came to my knowledge—one that I resolved should never come to hers."

They had left the sleeping village behind them, and were walking along the lane, and at this point Martin came almost to a stop, as though he would not be too near even to the house in which his sister was, and dropped his voice.

In low tones, almost whispers, Martin told the sad story of a father's wrongdoing. Money intrusted to him used in an emergency, with the confident assurance that it would soon be replaced. "He was quite sure of being able to do it," said Martin, "but no man can foresee his death, and he died without doing it. The shame and disgrace of exposure would have been dreadful. I could not bear to see my father's honored name loaded with infamy. It would have killed Celia to have it known. I concealed it from her and from every one, and I borrowed enough money to make the deficiency good. The money was paid over to the widow and orphans to whom it belonged and my father's name was saved. But the loan to me was only temporary. I gave as security the Dower House and its contents. Now the time for repayment has come and my creditor demands his money. If I cannot pay him this week everything must be sold and Celia and I will be penniless on the street. If I could only have sold my new book as I expected to have done I could have paid at least a part of it; but just now I have nothing."

Martin sat down on the bank by the roadside, as if with that instinct that makes despair hold itself still, and rested his elbows on his knees and his chin on his hands. And Douglas sat down beside him, searching his brains vainly for some hopeful suggestion.

"There must be something to be done," said Douglas at last. "Is there not some old friend of your father's who would advance the money?"

"You may be sure I have thought of that. There are many who could, but for various reasons would not; and there are others who would do so gladly, but have not the means. No, every avenue of t kind is closed. I suppose the smash m come."

"How long have you in which to ra the money?"

"Only three days now."

"The two young men sat in misera silence, Martin thinking despairingly the problem so old to him, Doug wrestling with it in its newness."

"Well!" said Martin at last, "I supp no smash is as bad as one thinks bef hand it will be. But I wish the next days were over. Let's go home. Thi a bad preparation for to-morrow, and at any rate have got a day's work bef you. I only wish I had!"

They stood up, slowly and wear Douglas still forgot to express himsel any verbal fashion; and Martin was dull enough to need that he should do Their hands met, and wrung each oth hard and long; and then Martin mo softly and slowly towards the gate of Dower House garden, and lifted latch, and Douglas went off towards H Ashes, thinking as he walked, of t strange trouble. If he had the mon how thankfully he would give it to s the woman he loved from humiliation. was she that he was concerned abo "Was it?" Douglas stopped sudde and asked himself this question.

"Was it pure disinterested affect that was agitating him? If," he saic himself, "there was one way of deliver her, but at the cost of losing all hope winning her for myself, do I love well enough to take it?" That was Touchstone!

What that way was, Douglas perceiv only too clearly. Caryl had the mo and could spare it easily, but if Caryl vanced it, he would have a right to pr his suit, and Martin would in comm gratitude support it with his powerful fluence. Ought he to tell Caryl of t opportunity? To do so would be to g him the advantage and was he bound do so? Douglas walked to and fro bating the question. In the end l triumphed. He would sacrifice his ho to save the woman he loved from sor and shame.

It was now broad day. Douglas w into the farmhouse, refreshed hims with a bath, ate a hasty breakfast, a went in search of Caryl.

To his surprise, Douglas found brother prostrate on a sofa, in a darker room in the hotel. He expected to h seen him surrounded by politicians, se ing off telegrams, and eagerly discuss the prospects of election. But Caryl v alone and apparently sick.

"Who's there?" he asked, without m ing, as Douglas entered. "I beg' y pardon—I must have been half asleep- did not hear."

"I made the landlord bring me up. told him that I must see you," s Douglas gravely. "I wouldn't have c turbed you, but that it is a matter of i portance."

At the first sound of his voice Ca half started up, then with a muttered clamation lay down again in the same titude.

"Why, Earl! is it you?" he said ratl confusedly. "Excuse me. Sit dov will you? I'm listening, but I've go splitting headache — I can't see if I upright."

"I'm afraid this is not a good time trouble you," said Douglas stiffly. would go away now if it were not alm a matter of life and death."

"Oh! never mind. It is only th when I was in India I had a touch of t sun, I suppose, and since then, especia when I have been about in the heat— But go on. Tell me what you ca about. Time was when it wouldn't ha needed a matter of life and death to bri you to me—but never mind that just no What is it?"

Douglas had no need to waste time words, and he did not attempt to mak moving tale of it: if the facts did n move his auditor, he had no hope of doi so by eloquence.

Caryl still lay in that constrained at tude, as if by main force holding his s fering sufficiently at bay to permit him listen and to understand. That he d listen and understand was evident, thou he showed no emotion or surprise beyo a half-ejaculation when the name of Ha erton was first mentioned.

PEASANT WOMEN OF PORTO RICO WASHING CLOTHES

N a recent letter from San Juan, Rev. James Jamieson. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Sunday School missionary in Porto Rico. writes some very interesting facts concerning the condition spiritual work on the island. He says:

The general outlook in the direction of secu- l education and moral improvement is very couraging. Here in San Juan, in Ponce, in Yaguez, in Rio Piedras, in Cantano and at other points of importance, the bread and ter of life are being lovingly dispensed by self-denying men and women who have come e strong in the faith of Jesus, and in their le of suffering humanity, to spend and be nt for the glory of God and the eternal l-being of the race. The purely educational terests of the Porto Ricans are not now g neglected. On the contrary, the public ool system patterned after that of the ited States, is being gradually established all available points on the island, and, in t near future, there is every reason for be- ing that every town, village and hamlet in rto Rico will be blessed with good schools d efficient teachers. To illustrate what I e just said, with respect to the progress of ucation, one example will be sufficient. out a month ago, a secular school was es- tablished by the Rev. Mr. Scott, of Phila- phia, in the suburb of Santurce, which has ved a remarkable success. The school is gely attended by all classes of Porto Ri- children.

The Ecumenical Council

Preparations Begun for a Great Religious Gathering in April Next

AN interesting meeting of the Committee of Arrangements for the Ecumenical Council on Foreign Missions was held in Assembly Hall, 156 Fifth avenue, on the evening of Jan. 11, Hon. Seth Low presiding. Its object was to rouse the people of this country to a realization of the character and magnitude of the Ecumenical Council to be held in New York in April, and to enlist the co-operation that will make it a success. The speakers were Rev. J. T. Gracey, D.D., President of the International Missionary Union; Rev. J. H. Barrows, President of Oberlin College, Ohio; Rev. William R. Huntington, D.D., Rev. Arthur J. Brown, D.D., and Messrs. Morgan Williams and Charles M. Jesup. Rev. W. J. Lord led the opening prayer and appropriate hymns were sung.

In his well-chosen introductory remarks, Mr. Low spoke of the timeliness in this great season of national prosperity and intellectual activity, of the proposed gathering of leaders in religious thought for the purpose of the extension of the benefits of our faith to all peoples of the earth; he expressed the hope that "the time is coming when all Christendom—the Eastern Church, our Roman Catholic brethren and Protestants"—may recognize the purpose for which they exist—the moral and spiritual uplift of the world. Rev. Dr. Gracey emphasized the great value the Council will have in stimulating the missionary spirit, and solidifying Christian denominations for the redemption of the world. "Hunter tells us," he said, "that there are fifty millions who in the next fifty years will become Hindus, Mohammedans or Christians; these millions are standing to-night in line before the altars of the Christian Church. Bishop Thoburn tells us that he could baptize thousands into the church every month if he only had preachers to receive and care for the converts. Not only ignorant and uncivilized aborigines are thirsting for knowledge of our Christ, but the learned men of the East—the great brain and heart of India—want him."

Mr. Williams and Mr. Jesup explained the advantages of the Council from the standpoint of Christian laymen and business men who want the work of the Lord well done. About 4,000 delegates are expected. Those from the United States and Canada will pay their own expenses, the Committee supplying information and securing special rates; foreign delegates will be entertained at private homes or in hotels at the Committee's provision. Missionaries from Japan, China, India, Korea, Turkey, Palestine, Brazil, Africa, Mexico, Siam and Syria are expected. Mr. Jesup stated $40,000 as the sum needed; $6,000 has already been subscribed, the proprietor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD guaranteeing $1,000.

Dr. Barrows spoke most eloquently of American responsibilities in the evangelization of the East—particularly Asia. He told of finding in Oriental journeys American heralds of the Cross in all countries, and of hearing "My Country 'tis of Thee," sung by childish voices in strange lands. Rev. Dr. Huntington, explaining the nature and need of an Ecumenical Council, said that whatever one might be in national politics, in the politics of heaven a Christian must be an expansionist and imperialist, ever ready to extend the sovereignty of Christ.

Helen Gould and the Sailors

Miss Helen Gould has been recently displaying in Uncle Sam's sailor boys the same helpful interest that has made her a beloved one in our army. About a month ago, in company with Mrs. Russell Sage, she went to the naval branch of the Y. M. C. A., 167 Sands Street, Brooklyn, modestly presented the gift of a handsome mechanical musical instrument for the entertainment of the jackies; asked questions about the work and its needs; and straightway began planning an extension of accommodations and the erection of a new gymnasium.

Soon after, the Ladies' Auxiliary of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. met at Miss Gould's home; and Admiral Philip, Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, told them of the value of this Y. M. C. A. work at the very gates of the navy yard.

In a short time Miss Gould, accompanied by a party of friends, went across the river in the tug Narkeeta, sent by Admiral Philip, to the navy yard, where they were received by the Admiral and his wife, conducted through the grounds and buildings, and then to the Y. M. C. A. on Sands street, where the tars stood up, hats off, and greeted with a ringing cheer the little woman who has been so good to soldiers and sailors. She promised to come to see them again. "We know you! God bless you, Helen Gould!" they cried, as she went out.

The Moody Memorial Fund

A meeting of the Board of Trustees of Mr. Moody's three schools, namely, Northfield Seminary, East Northfield, Mass.; Mount Hermon School, and the Bible Institute, Chicago, was held on January 11. The chairman of the meeting was Mr. H. M. Moore, of Boston, who has been President of the Northfield Seminary for many years. There were also present Mrs. Julia Billings, Mr. and Mrs. Ira D. Sankey, Col. J. J. Janeway (President Mount Hermon School), James Talcot, New York City; Fleming H. Revell, Chicago; James McGranahan, Col. C. A. Hopkins, Boston; D. W. McWilliams, New York City; Gen. J. J. Estey, Brattleboro, Vt.; Anson Phelps Stokes, Jr., New York City; Rev. R. A. Torrey, Chicago; W. R. Moody, eldest son of the late evangelist; A. G. Moody, and others. The main business under discussion was to arrange for the raising and investing of the Endowment Fund which it is proposed to raise.

An advisory committee was elected, consisting of the following gentlemen: William E. Dodge, James Talcot, Anson Phelps Stokes, D. W. McWilliams, Morris K. Jesup, John S. Kennedy and Ira D. Sankey, New York City; Cyrus McCormick and Victor Lawson, Chicago; John H. Converse, and John Wanamaker, Philadelphia; Col. C. A. Hopkins, Boston and Francis White, Baltimore. D. W. McWilliams was elected treasurer of the Moody Memorial Endowment Fund. An investment committee was chosen, consisting of William E. Dodge, James Talcot and Morris K. Jesup, to take charge of the donations as they are received. Steps were also taken towards securing the co-operation of Mr. Moody's friends in England to help forward this movement. All the trustees expressed the feeling that the work committed to them by Mr. Moody should go forward without interruption, and all were convinced that it would receive the most loyal support from the Christian people of both continents.

HELPS ELECTRICITY.

Grape-Nuts Build the Brain that Does the Planning.

A famous electrical engineer, Foote, who constructed the 3,000-horse power electric plant which supplies Battle Creek, Kalamazoo and other Michigan cities, says there is no food known that will supply him with the vitality and mental vigor from breakfast to noon that Grape-Nuts will.

Mr. Foot, in conversation, said: "There is no doubt left in my mind of these facts. I have tried all sorts of food, and kept track of the results. I gain steadily in reserve force when I use Grape-Nuts, notwithstanding my occupation requires long continued and concentrated brain work." There is no artificial stimulant in Grape-Nuts. Nothing but the stimulus of good food that is scientifically prepared for immediate assimilation into blood and tissue, especially brain tissue.

Brain workers can get sure and understandable results by using Grape-Nuts.

Interesting Incidents of Bowery Mission Conversions as Related by the Superintendent

THE story that the tall young Irishman tells of his conversion rarely fails to move his audience to laughter or to tears. To laughter, because of the richness of the brogue, and the genuineness of the wit that bubbles up irrepressibly through every sentence: to tears, because of the pathos of the incident which always forms the climax of his rapidly told autobiographical sketch.

He had lived a wild, tumultuous life. Arrest at the age of eight for drunkenness was an appropriate and prophetic commencement of a career of sin, spent principally at sea, and in boisterous orgies at the different seaports of the world, and which finally culminated in his nearly being beaten to death by a New York policeman in a Bowery brawl. After being treated by the physicians at the hospital he made his way to the Bowery Mission, with his head and ribs broken and bandaged, one of his shoulders dislocated, and not quite sure as to some other parts of his anatomy except that they were frightfully sore. Both his eyes were blacked and his face bruised beyond all recognition. He had been to the Mission many times before, and he knew at any rate he would be kindly treated there. He was in such desperate need that of course the kindly janitor could not turn him away, so he was allowed for a few days to stay in one of the rooms on the cellar floor. He was such a pitiable looking object that he did not dare to go out on the streets, and kept as much as possible out of view of the workers and congregation of the Mission.

SUPT. J. G. HALLIMOND

But one night there came a speaker with a loud and sonorous voice. It not only rang in the lofty arched roof of the Mission itself, but away behind in the rafters of the kitchen, and even down into the depths of the cellar stores and corridors. The poor battered sailor heard it. He had been trying to console himself by a surreptitious smoke, when this voice first penetrated into his hiding-place. Listening intently, he imagined he could even catch some of the words. His curiosity was aroused, and, forgetting for the moment that he still held his pipe in his mouth, he mounted the stairway into the kitchen and quietly opened the door that leads into the hall by the side of the organ. The audience was in full view, so, quickly remembering his bandages and his bruises, he sadly closed the door again. But still that voice rang out, and now some of the words and even sentences of the speaker could be distinctly heard. He was filled with a yearning desire to hear more, and above all to see the face of the man who had so strangely moved him. A new idea flashed itself upon him.

Going out to the back, with his pipe still unconsciously held between his teeth, he climbed the ladder that led to the kitchen roof. Then he found there was another long ladder to scale before he could reach the dome of the building, from the open window of which he hoped to see and hear this wonderful man. He only had one whole arm, and it was a long climb; but he was a sailor, and there was no time to lose. So up he went, and soon found himself at the open window, exultingly looking down upon the listening crowd, and the earnest man whose trumpet tones had stirred his heart so deeply. It was one of New York City's most zealous ministers—Rev. J. A. Francis, of the Second Avenue Baptist Church—and when this eager Irishman ultimately reached his strange auditory, and to his delight found he could hear just as comfortably as if he had been seated in the regular crowd beneath, the first words that rolled up through the arches and fell upon his wondering ears were: "God is not mocked, for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." The words thrilled him with a strange and unearthly sensation. It was no longer the voice of a man, but the voice of God that he heard.

He listened, entranced. All the memories of his rebellious life seemed to come crowding in upon him. There was a battle royal upon the roof that night between the spirits of darkness and of light, between the spirit of doubt and the spirit of hope. At last, as the speaking ceased, and one of the stirring hymns, sung with such characteristic enthusiasm by that Bowery crowd, surged up through the open window, he fell upon his knees, placed his pipe upon the ledge, and looking up at the stars uttered one great yearning cry for mercy and help. And the shimmering stars looked down upon the upturned face of that pleading man, and the shadowy clouds floated away from the face of the smiling moon, and the summer zephyrs came sweeping up gently from the great Atlantic, and fanned his face and soothed the pain of his throbbing head, and his whole being was suffused with a new and melting tenderness beyond all words to express. And, as he climbed down the ladders again, he remembered the words so often heard in the Mission below, that now fell upon his broken heart like a wonderful balm, for oh how true they are: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. RESTING AND WAITING

ONLY resting for a season
From the labor and the strife;
Only waiting for the harvest,
That will surely crown my life.
I have planted, I have watered,
Pausing not for rest or sleep;
Patient toil must bring fruition;
I have sown, and I shall reap.

Only resting for a season;
Lying here with idle hands;
Waiting for "my ship" that's coming
From the far-off golden strands.
She is bringing countless treasure—
All that I have toiled to win;
I shall quaff from joy's full measure
Sometime "when my ship comes in."

Only resting for a season
From the wearing hopes and fears:
From the burdens and the sorrows
That have gathered with the years.
Only resting in the twilight
"Till the shadows flee away;"
Only waiting for the dawning
Of a better, brighter day.

No more waiting—only resting;
For life's harvest-time is past;
All its golden grain is garnered,
All its full sheaves safe at last.
Hands that toiled for other's helping,
Now are folded evermore;
And the treasure-ship is anchored
Close beside the "Shining Shore."

Impoverished blood is the secret of half the disease known to humanity—rheumatism, dropsy, stomach and liver trouble, with all their attendant misery, may nine times out of ten be traced to the circulatory system. Correct that and all goes well. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People increase the red corpuscles in the blood and thereby give it new life and richness. They also tone up the nerves and are a specific for many serious disorders.

Mrs. Joseph M. Evans, of Carterville, Mo., says: "Two years ago I had dropsy of the left limb so severely that my physicians said I could not recover. I had been sick about a year, and most of the time was bedfast. The treatment of the physicians did me no permanent good. I steadily grew worse.

"My brother finally insisted that I try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People. The first box effected a change for the better in my condition, and I continued to improve steadily.

"I took about six months' steady treatment. The result is that I do not now feel a trace of my former ailments."

How the Boers Live*

THE Boer's habits and mode of life are similar to those of the American ranchman. The Boer likes to be out of the sight of the smoke of his neighbor's house; and to live fifteen or twenty miles from another dwelling is a matter of satisfaction rather than regret to him. The patriarchal custom of the people provides against the lack of companionship which naturally would follow this custom. When a Boer's children marry they settle within a short distance of the original family homestead: generally several hundred yards distant. In this way, in a few years, a small village is formed on the family estates, which may consist of from five hundred to ten thousand acres of uninclosed grazing ground. Every son when he marries is entitled to a share of the estate, which he is supposed to use for the support of himself and his family, and in that way the various estates grow smaller each generation. When an estate grows too small to support the owner, he "treks" to another part of the country, and receives from the state such an amount of territory as he may require. Boer houses, as a rule, are situated a long distance away from the flocks of the transport wagons, in order that passing infected animals may not introduce disease into the flocks and herds of the farmer. Strangers are seldom seen as a result of this isolation, and news from the outer world does not reach the Boers unless they travel to the towns to make the annual purchases of necessities. Their chief recreation is the shooting of game, which abounds in almost all parts of the country. Besides being their recreation, it is also their duty, for it is much cheaper to kill a buck and use it to supply the family larder than to kill a ox or a sheep for the same purpose. It is seldom that a Boer misses his aim, be the target a deer or an Englishman, and he has ample time to become proficient in the use of the rifle. His gun is his constant companion on the veldt and at his home, and the long alliance has resulted in earning for him the distinction of being the best marksman and the best irregular soldier in the world.

The dress of the Boer is of the roughest description and material, and suited to this occupation. Corduroy and flannel for the body, a wide-brimmed felt hat for the head, and soft leather-soled boots suited for walking on the grass, complete the regulation Boer costume, which is picturesque as well as serviceable. The clothing, which is generally made by the wife, or vrouw, makes no pretension to fit or style, and is quite satisfactory to the wearer if it clings to the body.

The religion of the Boers is a pronounced characteristic. The simple faith in a Supreme Being, which the original emigrants from Europe carried to South Africa, has been handed down from one generation to another, and in two centuries of fighting, trekking, and ranching has lost none of its pristine depth and fervor. With the Boer his religion is his first and uppermost thought. The Old Testament is the pattern which he strives to follow. The father of the family reads from its pages every day, and from it he formulates his ideas of right and wrong as they are to be applied to the work of to-day. Whether he wishes to exchange cattle with his neighbor or give his daughter in marriage to a neighbor's son, he consults the Testament, and finds therein the advice that is applicable to the situation. He reads nothing but the Bible, and consequently his belief in its teachings is indestructible and supreme. His religious temperament is portrayed in almost every sentence he utters, and by repetition of Biblical parables and sayings is a custom which so impresses itself upon the mind of the stranger that it is but natural that those who are unacquainted with the Boer should declare it is a sure sign of his hypocrisy.

Oom Paul's People. A narrative of the British-Boer Troubles in South Africa, with a history of the Boers, the Country and its Institutions. By Howard C. Hillegas. Illustrated with eight photographs and a map of South Africa. Price, $1.50. Publishers, D. Appleton & Co., Fifth Ave., New York City.

THE MOTHER'S CORONAL

(A prose Idyl)

FOR over twenty years two States separated us from our dear mother; and when she died, aged seventy, they sent us a lock of her hair.

The lock was almost silver-white—beautiful type of the holiness of the saints.

Some strands seemed gray, like the shadows that are coming into our own lives, just as we are crossing the border lines from youth and middle-age into the twilight of the evening.

There was yet a lingering trace of the shining ancestral brown, of which she had been so proud because it represented to her—not only the bright years of her own sweet, pure maidenhood—but several centuries of bravery, chivalry and honor.

The brown—we well remember—
The brown of her strong, firm womanhood.
When wifehood, motherhood, was sweet
And daily care was borne with song.

But years went and shadows came;
Then came the gray—
Creeping in slowly, as if by stealth,
With here and there a line of silver gleaming.

How the days darkened,
And the night grew longer,
And the golden-brown turned silver more and more—
And the gray kept coming on!

But now in heaven,
Where shadows come no more
What shall her coronal be—
Silver or gold or brown?

Port Calhoun, Neb. W. H. WOODS.

The Fear of Humbug

Prevents Many People from Trying a Good Medicine

Stomach troubles are so common and in most cases so obstinate to cure that people are apt to look with suspicion on any remedy claiming to be a radical, permanent cure for dyspepsia and indigestion. Many such pride themselves on their acuteness in never being humbugged, especially in medicines.

This fear of being humbugged can be carried too far, so far, in fact, that many people suffer for years with weak digestion rather than risk a little time and money in faithfully testing the claims made of a preparation so reliable and universally used as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Now Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are vastly different in one important respect from ordinary proprietary medicines for the reason that they are not a secret patent medicine, no secret is made of their ingredients, but analysis shows them to contain the natural digestive ferments, pure aseptic pepsin, the digestive acids, Golden Seal, bismuth, hydrastis and nux. They are not cathartic, neither do they act powerfully on any organ, but they cure indigestion on the common sense plan of digesting the food eaten thoroughly before it has time to ferment, sour and cause the mischief. This is the only secret of their success.

Cathartic pills never have and never can cure indigestion and stomach troubles because they act only on the bowels, whereas the whole trouble is really in the stomach.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets taken after meals disgests the food. That is all there is to it. Food not digested or half-digested is poison as it creates gas, acidity, headaches, palpitation of the heart, loss of flesh and appetite and many other troubles which are often called by some other name.

They are sold by druggists everywhere at 50 cents per package. Address F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich., for little book on stomach diseases, sent free.

Young and old appreciate Welch's Grape Juice. There's no other beverage like it—but it is more than a beverage—it is food and drink in one. The Grape sugar and the delicate acid of the Concord Grape are found unchanged in Welch's Grape Juice, and are readily absorbed by the system, producing an immediate vigor from which there is no reaction. Write the Welch Grape Juice Co., Westfield, N. Y., for free Booklet.

MORE COFFEE FACTS.

Study the Question Yourself.

"When the doctor said 'no more coffee,' I was dismayed, for as an ardent lover of coffee and a crank in the matter of its preparation, I had grown to believe that life was not worth living without it, but the dull stupidity and the almost daily headache so interfered with my profession (literature) that I was compelled to seek the doctor's advice.

"I saw an improvement from the start, but missed my morning beverage and felt a great lack. It was at the home of a friend and Postum apostle, Mrs. ——, of Lonsdale, that I tasted my first Postum. Her family had sworn by it a year or more, and declared themselves, from the least to the greatest, benefited by its use.

"I was surprised to find it really palatable, and determined that I could improve on it myself. I purchased a box, and as we all do, on the first trial, made a lamentable failure of it, through insufficient boiling, and the Postum was poked away on an upper shelf, until the oft-reiterated newspaper statements made me determine to try it again, with long boiling.

"I took twenty-five minutes to prepare it, about ten minutes to bring it up to a boil, and then allowed it to boil steadily for fifteen minutes, and from the first sip, I was enthusiastic over the new beverage, and even wanted a second cup. It has never palled upon me, morning or night. Nothing could induce me to go back to the berry coffee.

"The change Postum has wrought in me seems little short of miraculous. For the first time in many years, I am really well, my color has freshened, headache has not visited me for many weeks, and my ability for work has returned with all its old zest. I shall never cease to be grateful for what I feel is a remarkable cure due to nothing more than Postum Food Coffee, in place of the oriental berry.

"Sincerely yours,' Mrs. R. B. Tallman, Centredale, R. I.

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

Few People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is the safest and most efficient disinfectant and purifier in nature, but few realize its value when taken into the human system for the same cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you take of it the better, it is not a drug at all, but simply absorbs the gases and impurities always present in the stomach and intestines and carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smoking, drinking or after eating onions and other odorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves the complexion, it whitens the teeth and further acts as a natural and safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect in the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the mouth and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggests sell charcoal in one form or another, but probably the best charcoal and the most for the money is in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges; they are composed of the finest powdered Willow charcoal, and other harmless antiseptics in tablet form or rather in the form of large, pleasant tasting lozenges, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon tell in a much improved condition of the general health, better complexion, sweeter breath and purer blood, and the beauty of it is, that no possible harm can result from their continued use, but on the contrary great benefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the benefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering from gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear the complexion and purify the breath, mouth and throat; I also believe the liver is greatly benefitted by the daily use of them; they cost but twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and although in some sense a patent preparation yet I believe I get more and better charcoal in Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of the ordinary charcoal tablets."

"SUPERB" UPHOLSTERED SPRING

It is impossible to locate the spring through the upholstering, and a person of ordinary weight can sleep on it in comfort for years without a mattress.

This is how it is made: There is a substantial wood frame with corners reinforced by steel brackets. Resting on pads which prevent noise are 72 heavy oil-tempered steel springs. Over the springs are two thicknesses of burlap, a thick layer of natural moss (which is better than ordinary hair) and then another layer of cotton. Covering the whole arrangement is a beautiful Gobelin Art ticking.

Samples of the moss and ticking will be sent on request.

Price $15.60. Always sent on approval, freight paid. If not perfectly satisfactory the price paid will be refunded.

Order of us or your dealer.

Our booklet, "Beds of Quality," tells about this spring. Send for it. It is free.

NEW HOME RUPTURE CURE

Remarkable Method that Heals Any Rupture Without Pain or Danger

No Operation or Detention From Work —Is Cheap, Safe and Sure.

Dr. W. S. Rice has backed up with convincing facts his statement that rupture can be cured at the patients' home without pain, danger operation or detention from work. He has invented a cheap and reliable method that has met with marvelous success and thousands of people ruptured for years have been permanently cured. It cured R. M. Wilsie, of Brandon, Wis., who had been ruptured 20 years. Mrs. M. E. Smith, Rockingham, Vt., was badly ruptured and cured herself by Dr. Rice's method. Wm. Bigford, Bishop Mills, Ont., tried various trusses with no success and finally cured himself by the Rice plan. Jacob Lindsger, Drums, Pa., owes his cure to Dr. Rice. G. Wilson, Sogn, Minn., has a double rupture and calls Dr. Rice's method a God-send.

Several thousand cases are reported cured by this remarkable method and as it is very low in price, easily used, adapted to either sex, adults or children, every ruptured person should at once investigate it. Write to Dr. W. S. Rice, 392-D, Main St., Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a full description, so you can cure yourself in a few weeks, long before the heavy work of the springtime begins. Do not fail to write to-day and if you know of others afflicted, send their names for this wonderfully valuable information. They will appreciate your kindness.

Things That Endure

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 4. Matt. 7: 21-27

MORE marked than any other characteristic of the last quarter of the nineteenth century, is the tendency to estimate men by their conduct, rather than by their creed. The time is past in which the intelligent Baptist holds aloof from the Presbyterian on the sole ground that he is not a Baptist. He regards the Presbyterian as his brother, and, though he still wishes that the Presbyterian agreed with him on the subject of baptism, he is not going to allow that divergence to prevent him grasping his brother's hand and working with him to achieve the objects both desire. The Methodist may wonder that the Congregationalist does not see the value of bishops and of a General Conference, but he will not allow the fact that he does not, to prevent him having the Congregationalist as his comrade in the fight against evil and misery in the world.

There are certain fundamental principles—things that remain—that ought to draw together the men that hold them in common. Men have lost sight of this fact in religious matters, far too much. The great satirist's famous fable of the egg placed it in a light only too true. He told how he had found a great community divided on the question of how an egg should be sucked. One section of the community contended that it should be through a puncture in the small end of the egg, and the other that it should be through a puncture in the larger end. The dispute grew until it came to a regular war. But the observer noticed that no matter how much the "big-endian" hated the "small-endian," they both hated still more the man who said it did not matter which end of the egg was punctured, so long as the eater could extract the meat. He was the man that incurred the enmity of both sides. So it has been in religion. The Baptist denounced the Congregationalist, but both of them reserved their most withering denunciation for the man who said it did not matter whether the candidate was sprinkled or immersed, so long as he had the baptism of the Holy Spirit. So in Church government, the Methodist with his Conference, the Presbyterian with his General Assembly, the Episcopalian with his Apostolic succession, have been at war with the Baptist and the Congregationalist, who believe that each church should be a little self-governing republic, and all of them were at war with any who spoke of their differences as non-essentials.

Happily, a better era has dawned, and the thanks of the whole Christian world are due to the Christian Endeavor Society for the services it has rendered in promoting it. It has, at least, brought Christians of many denominations into contact with one another. Contact, alone, was necessary to a better understanding. Each learned that the other loved the Saviour, was trying to bring souls to him, was preaching him as the infallible remedy for the world's troubles, and was honestly trying to follow him in the world. Beside that, each learned that the other hated sin and was trying to convince the world of "righteousness, temperance, and the judgment to come." So it has come about, that the more intelligent a Christian man is the more tolerant he becomes and the more ready he is to join hands with other Christian men of other denominations. The real difference which separates men now and which will go on increasingly to separate men, is that of conduct. The man who professes to believe in Christ, who calls himself a Christian, but who does not incorporate Christ's principles into his life, is separated by a high wall from him whose heart is full of love and kindness, who is trying to be good and to do good and is always ready to lend a helping hand to those who need it. The importance of a right creed is in no way overlooked. We still recognize that "as a man thinketh in his heart so is he," but we have learned that the true Christian, "he who doeth the will of the Father," may not agree with us in details, but is nevertheless a brother worthy of our love.

The outer covering or shell of grain is entirely indigestible, yet we see quantities of persons filling the delicate stomachs of children with oats in some form or whole wheat products. Questions of the Week

1. Where did the phrase "Sound Money" originate?

In the brain of John Sherman. The same is true of "Honest Money," "Sound Currency," "An Honest Dollar," and some other catch phrases which have been in general use since the money question forced itself into prominence. It was first used by him in the discussions following his return from Europe in 1868. Prior to that he had been a bimetallist. In 1868 he went to England, where he had several conferences with Baron Rothschild. He then attended an international monetary conference at Paris. There, in a speech, he astounded the representatives of France and Prussia by the unauthorized statement that the United States favored the single gold standard. Such an idea had never been heard of before. On his return, the movement to secure the single gold standard was inaugurated, though for a time he himself seemed still to favor bimetallism. The above catch phrase first appeared in Sherman's letters and speeches in the discussion which followed. A. G. CHAPMAN.

2. Is it right for a reformed drunkard to marry, and take the risk of transmitting the appetite for drink to another generation?

It would not be wrong for a reformed drunkard to remain single. While marriage is the desirable and normal state for men and women, some are commended in Scripture for not entering wedlock (Matt. 19:12; I. Cor. 9:5, 15). For the sake of the Kingdom some have not married. Would it not be praiseworthy if some for the sake of humanity would make the sacrifice? Many things must be known before a definite and safe answer could be given. If a person himself has inherited the appetite; if by long and free indulgence he has strengthened it; if, though reformed, he has much difficulty in restraining it, and if only a short time has elapsed since he gave up the habit, he should not think of marrying. But if his ancestors were free from the vice, and his own indulgence not without restraint, and of but few years' duration, and the person feels himself thoroughly rid of the appetite, and has been conquered by the grace of God, and if wedded to another absolutely free from the appetite, it is not probable that his children, under careful instruction, would develop the appetite. R. W. THOMPSON.

3. Is riding on cars and ferryboats on Sunday for church-going purposes sinful?

This is a question for each individual conscience. To him who doubts, it is sin. "Whatsoever is not of faith is sin" (Rom. 14:23), but let no man judge his brother. Cars and boats do not run to accommodate the churches, but for the profits, and, by their Sunday work, they debar a large class of people from public worship; hence Christians should discountenance them and avoid their use, even at great sacrifice to themselves. The example also is pernicious, as the unbelieving world who behold Christians riding cannot know their purpose or destination. "Let each man be fully assured in his own mind." (Rom. 14:5.)
ANNA T. PEARCE.

4. Which should be our strongest motive-power in every-day action—love, patience or duty?

Love. This includes patience; for love is long-suffering. If mere duty be the leading motive, our tasks will not be performed with as much benefit to ourselves or blessing to others as when love moves. Duty is not to be ignored. Christ said, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" That was duty, but love to his Father led to his consecration to the performance of duty. Love is invariably a stronger motive, for while love will lead to the performance of duty, duty does not inspire to love. Love in this instance is not mere affection, but the love to God and love to man which is said in God's Word to be the fulfilling of the law. Duty calls for constant sacrifices which only love can readily make. S. R. ROGERS.

5. What part of our income should we set apart for religious and charitable purposes?

As a rule certainly not less than one-tenth. The rule of the tithe is regarded by many Christians as being only a provision under the Mosaic law. This is not the case, as Abraham paid tithes long before Moses. "And if ye be Christs," says Paul (Gal. 3:29) "then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise." Abraham's sacrificial offerings are done away in Christ. The Abrahamic example in the tithe is a good one for Abraham's seed to follow. Malachi 3:8-10 is not superceded by any New Testament law. When Paul says that we are to give as God has prospered us (I. Cor. 10:2) he emphasizes the law of proportionate giving, but does not limit it to the tithe. A tithe would be a very mean and unworthy proportion of some people's incomes. On the other hand, even Christians of small means may well have sufficient faith as well as love to make the tithe the minimum of the Lord's offering. The testimony of many Christians is that it is easier to give, and that there is much more joy in giving, when a proportion of the income is absolutely set apart for God.
E. M. BERRY.

6. Which of the two poets, Shakespeare or Milton, has been the greatest benefactor to the world at large through his poetical works?

Shakespeare. He interprets human nature to man by discovering and making manifest the weakness, hypocrisy, intrigue and vanity of our race; also revealing what virtue and strength grow out of it. Heine says, "Nature wanted to see how she looked and she made Goethe." So, nature wanting man to see how he himself looked and acted, made Shakespeare. Shakespeare is the artist of real conditions. Milton is not, for, though truly the poet—beautiful in imagery, bold in creation—his sentiments are not easily applied to every-day life. Shakespeare teaches us with scenes and incidents of familiar relation till we grow from these through higher concepts up to levels where the mind can grasp fuller knowledge. Shakespeare has reached and influenced a vastly larger multitude than Milton has.
ROBT. H. GOODIER.

7. How can a deeper interest be best aroused among Christians, in the work of Foreign Missions?

Given a church with a young people's society in it, and one consecrated person devoted to foreign missions, and the case is won. I have in mind a church where that was nearly the situation. To-day they have their own missionary on the foreign field. This missionary enthusiast came with dejected air to the chairman of a large and flourishing society with his woes. He was told of Dr. Hudson Taylor and his work in the China Inland Mission with nothing back of him but fervent, prevailing prayer, and he was asked to take as his motto John Eliot's "Prayer and pains through faith in Jesus Christ will do anything." In three weeks he had a live missionary committee in that society composed of the most capable young people in it. The chairman presented each member of his committee with that little pamphlet by Speer, "Prayer and Missions:" thus enthused they bought David Park's "Missionary Methods," and "The Missionary Spoke of the Epworth Wheel," by W. W. Cooper; also Belle M. Brain's "Fuel for Missionary Fires." They searched their own denominational missionary magazines for interesting items and found them in abundance. Their missionary meetings grew rapidly in size and interest. To-day they have a small but very readable missionary library.

8. Can a man be a good Christian and yet work on the Sabbath day? Take, for instance, a railroad conductor, milkman or engineer, etc.

Works of necessity are permissible on the Sabbath, but the necessity must be unquestionable, otherwise such work is a violation of good Christian morals and an offence toward God. SAMUEL T. PARKER.

9. What may be done to make the Sunday evening church service more attractive, without sacrificing the eternal fitness of things?

If a social element could be introduced into the evening service, and the order of exercises for at least a portion of the hour be made less formal and more co-operative between pastor and people, the whole service would be more attractive. Practical experience shows that the holding of a Christian Endeavor service immediately before the church service lessens the attendance at the latter. This suggests the use of Christian Endeavorers, on the programme of the evening exercises. More variety in style of discourse, the delivery of short series of lectures on Bible characters, noted Christian workers, hymns, hymn writers, practical questions of the day from a religious standpoint, also thoroughly good illustrated lectures, sacred concerts, short talks from laymen actively engaged in Gospel work, and exercises, musical and otherwise, from various classes of the Sunday School are some of many features that have aided in increasing Sunday evening congregations. R. V. STETSON.

10. What should be our position toward those who have wilfully and grievously wronged us, and persistently continue to do so at every possible opportunity? Christ teaches us to forgive, as we wish to be forgiven, but are we to forgive these wrong-doers before they seek forgiveness and without forsaking their evil ways?

If the offender be a professing Christian, Christ sets forth the proper attitude in the words recorded in Matt. 18:15-17. We should, while pursuing the course laid down by Christ, cultivate the spirit of forgiveness manifested by dying Stephen when he cried concerning his murderers, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." Toward non-professors the same spirit should be indulged and the course enjoined by Christ pursued so far as possible.
MARY GARDNER.

Miscellaneous Questions

Mrs. M. B., Elbert, Colo. How do you rate the works of Flavius Josephus? How far can we take them for authority?

He was the most celebrated of Jewish historians. In his day he was lauded for his literary abilities, and was accounted as a classic author. It is asserted, however, that his national pride led him into many errors and misstatements, which detract somewhat from the value of his writings. Still, compared with other authors on the same subjects, they are invaluable as throwing a flood of light on Jewish history.

M. A. F., Emaus, Pa. Is there such a thing as witchcraft? There is a little girl here, four and a-half years old, who is suffering from a peculiar illness, and a number of persons think she is bewitched.

There are numerous modern cases of alleged witchcraft, but being in almost every instance, unauthenticated, they are generally regarded as spurious. In all likelihood, a good skillful physician would find the cause of your patient's condition to be something quite explainable. Better consult one. Certain morbid conditions result in hysteria and forms of dementia that may give rise to the belief in spirit possession. In some instances, certain faculties of the mind are phenomenally quickened. Science has explained much that heretofore has seemed occult and incomprehensible.

Mrs. A. B. T., Grand View, Ia. Is it right for a minister of the Gospel to write his sermons? When Christ sent the twelve to preach (Matt. 10) he strictly forbade them to take scrip.

"Scrip" has no reference to manuscripts, but means the wallet or side satchel used by travelers for holding provisions. There is nowhere in the Bible any prohibition against written sermons, although oral address is encouraged, and dependence on God for ability in great emergencies (see Luke 21:15) does not imply that no preparation on the preacher's part is necessary at other times. It is the duty of a minister to study out all his discourses carefully (lest he make rash or ill-judged statements), and to ask the Divine blessing upon the work of preparation. As to speaking from notes or from memory, it must depend wholly upon the ability of the preacher to memorize his sermons. There is not a particle of doubt that the most effective sermons, in modern times at least, have been those that were carefully prepared and prayed over in advance of delivery.

Welcome News to Music Lovers

SINCE our first announcement, in which we offered the Concert Roller-Organ, together with five music rollers at $10.00 in Cash or $12.00 on the instalment plan, we have decided to lay before our readers a far better proposition which, we are sure, will be accepted so quickly that within a few days after this announcement appears, every one of the few hundred organs left will be disposed of.

Instead of sending out only Five rollers of your own selection we will hereafter send TWENTY, free of charge; thus giving $6.00 worth of music with every instrument.

Under these circumstances we withdraw our instalment offer and will sell the balance of the organs only for spot cash, namely: $10.00; and for these ten dollars we will send the Instrument and Twenty pieces of music, freight charges to be paid by the purchaser.

We have notified all former purchasers of this change, and we are sending them, as fast as we hear from them, the additional music rollers without charge. In order to do this it will be necessary to purchase over 10,000 music rollers, involving a large outlay of money, but as the organs sold much faster than we had originally expected, and the expense of handling them was much less than we had figured on, we find that we can afford this additional complimentary supply of music, and we consider it only fair to include in this generous distribution all those who have already purchased an organ and paid for it. If you wish to secure one of these marvelous instruments with twenty indestructible music rollers of your own selection, send us $10 just as soon as you see this. Over a thousand tunes now ready. HARVESTING A POTATO CROP IN CUBA

A LITTLE FAN MAKER

THE subject of Cuba is ever of fresh and acute interest to our readers, for they sowed in that island, with free and generous hand seeds that should bring forth an abundant harvest. Romeo H. Freer, Jr., Superintendent of Agriculture for the uban Relief Fund, has just returned om a ten-months' stay in the island. he station at which Mr. Freer spent ost of his time was near Matanzas, but e journeyed over many sections. He id: "The reconcentrado is a thing of the ast, if he wants to be. There is labor nd to spare for every man in Cuba who ants it, and who will go where it can be ound — seldom more than a few miles stant from where he may be liv- g. There are employment agencies in avana which are having a hard time to pply the demand for laborers com- g from the big plantations now open- g; and steamers arrive every day bring- g thousands of peasants from Spain id the Canary Islands to meet this de- and. The question of the hour is not, How shall we get work for the Cubans do?" but, "Where will the men come om to do the work in Cuba?"

"If every Cuban farmer were given all e land he could cultivate," said Mr. reer, "there would still be nine-tenths of e island uncultivated. That is what the ext government reports and the census ow in preparation will show.

"The Cubans are poor, poor as poverty, it except among those who refuse to leave e cities, actual hunger is rare. This was ot the case when I went to Cuba some n months ago. Riding about the coun- y as the agent of the Cuban Industrial elief Fund, I found many people at arvation's point. In a large family ving in a miserable thatched hut, I re- ember one little lad who was too far one for effectual relief; chronic hunger id given him what the doctor called ancer of the stomach.' But THE CHRIS- IAN HERALD readers, who have done much for Cuba, do not need any in- rmation concerning famine horrors.

"One crop (in some sections two), has een harvested since the American occu- ation; and the introduction of machin- ery is working improvements in various directions. Improvement is needed, for Cuban methods in agriculture are primitive in the extreme. The plow most in use in the island for breaking land is a heavy one, much the same as that used on the prairies, except that it is much interior. The native plow used for second plowing is really the fork of a tree with an iron tip on the end that goes into the ground, the prongs serving as handles. This implement takes the place of our harrow. The rotary disk plow shown in the picture is the one which I introduced in Cuba. I found this, after trying some twenty different kinds, to be the only plow that would do fine work in Cuba, principally because of its having a scraper that cleans the disk; no plow "scours" or cleans itself in Cuban soil. Cubans have no harrows, spading forks, pitchforks or scythes: they have not even names for these in their farm dialect, which, by the way, numbers only seven or eight hundred words. They called my rake peignia (a comb), and my scythe machete (a knife). About $1,000 will prepare and plant a sugar crop on thirty-three and one-third acres. December, January and February and a part of March is the time for cutting cane, and the value of your crop depends a good deal upon the time of cutting. The longer you can hold back your cutting, the better your harvest. Oxen do most of the draught-work: they are yoked by the horns, as in Mexico. Mules are also employed; they are much cheaper than oxen, for the reason that they live on native grasses and grain, and can do better work. All carting in the cities is done by mules. The Cuban horse is very small—almost a pony—and he has a peculiar 'single-foot' gait, which makes him a fine riding animal. Spaniards often ride ponies fifty to sixty miles a day, feeding them nothing more than grass, and traveling over a road almost impassible to an American horse. I have ridden over roads that in the United States would be considered a rock quarry. They were originally paved with cobblestones and covered with dirt, but the stones are broken or missing, and ruts are often worn two feet into the bed-rock beneath. The two-wheeled Cuban cart is crude and lumbering, but a most majestic affair. The wheels are each eight feet high. No two vehicles will make the same track. It is necessary to have them as strong as possible, or they could not "live" in their struggle with the ruts that generations of such carts have made.

"The Cubans—that is, the Cuban in the country, the farmer and farm-laborer—I do not consider a lazy people. The Cuban who loafs about the cities has brought an undeserved reproach upon Cubans as a class. Of course you can not find New York 'hustle' in Cuba; that is impossible in the tropics; but at the end of the day my Cubans showed a good day's work. The women have some ingenious industries, as, for instance, the weaving of grass into hats and fans.

A CUBAN LAUNDRY

Some good American instruction in the raising of poultry, dairying, and aviary work would be a very good thing for the Cubans. Cuba is an excellent place for bees because there are so many flowers; the honey has a fine flavor. Hives have been robbed and destroyed to such an extent by Spaniards, insurgents and starving people that bees are almost exterminated. Cuban ignorance of dairying would be laughable if it were not pitiable. When milk is sent into town on the backs of horses it is so thoroughly churned before reaching its destination that it would be butter if it were not so poor. The more ordinary way of getting your milk to you is by a more primitive method than this, however, as every visitor to the island knows—the cow brings it herself. Goat's and asses' milk is used almost as much as that of cows'; and it is quite an odd sight to behold a drove of these little asses rounded up in front of your door and the milkman milking as much milk as you order. 'You are sure now there is no water,' he may say proudly.

"When one goes land-buying to Cuba, the great difficulty is to find a tract small enough to meet modest requirements, a cabbalarie (33 1-3 acres) being the smallest purchaseable tract. Land is known as 'red,' 'black,' 'mulatto' and 'white,' the last being clay and worthless. Red land grows tobacco, corn, cane, oranges and various fruits; black land, cane, Irish potatoes and light crops; rice is produced on the black swamps or 'wet' lands; 'mulatto,' which is a cross between the red and black, is good for market-gardening. So, before purchasing, know the crop you want to grow. Bear in mind, too, that the excellence of one plantation is no proof of the value of the one next to it. There are abrupt changes in the quality of Cuban soil, and this fact has opened a way for tricksters (and many are invading Cuba now) to impose upon ignorant purchasers. See your land before buying, is sound advice. Through the fertile valley of Guanacaro—the most beautiful valley I ever saw—I rode for five hours. Crossing a ridge, perhaps a hundred feet high, I rode for the next two hours across a plain absolutely destitute of all vegetation except low palmetto shrubs; there was not a bush big enough to hide a bird; it would produce nothing of value, yet it could be truthfully described as high, dry and well cleared. Land can be had at from $1 to $20 an acre, its actual value running from nothing at all to possibly thousands. The Cuban, as I found him, is a clever, shrewd trader; he is fully able to hold his own. When buying land of a Cuban, it is well to imitate his example; be as polite and affable as he is, and talk about everything else except land-buying. That is the quickest way to come to the point, although it may take you, in this way, a week to find out what he really expects to get for his place. I do not mean to say that the Cuban is a dishonest trader; he is clever. The rock walls enclosing farms attract the visitor's attention. I rode forty miles alongside one broken only by gates to plantations.

Wonders of the Hand

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Corinthians 12 : 21 . . . — The eye cannot say unto the hand I have no need of thee

THESE words suggest that some time two very important parts of the human body got into controversy, and the eye became insolent and full of braggadocio, and said: "I am an independent part of the human system. How far I can see, taking in spring morning and midnight aurora! Compared with myself, what an insignificant thing is the human hand! I look down upon it. There it hangs, swinging at the side, a clump of muscles and nerves, and it cannot see an inch either way. It has no lustre compared with that which I beam forth." "What senseless talk," responds the hand. "You, the eye, would have been put out long ago but for me. Without the food I have earned you would have been sightless and starved to death years ago. You cannot do without me any better than I can do without you." At this part of the disputation Paul of my text breaks in, and ends the controversy by declaring: "The eye cannot say unto the hand I have no need of thee."

Fourteen hundred and thirty-three times, as nearly as I can count by aid of concordance, does the Bible speak of the human hand. We are all familiar with the hand, but the man has yet to be born who can fully understand this wondrous instrument. Sir Charles Bell, the English surgeon, came home from the battlefield of Waterloo, where he had been amputating limbs and binding up gunshot fractures, and wrote a book entitled The Hand: Its Mechanism and Vital Endowments as Evidencing Design. But it is so profound a book that only a scientist who is familiar with the technicalities of anatomy and physiology can understand it.

So we are all going on opening and shutting this divinely-constructed instrument—the hand—ignorant of much of the revelation it was intended to make of the wisdom and goodness of God. You can see by their structure that shoulder and elbow and forearm are getting ready for the culmination in the hand. There is your wrist, with its eight bones and their ligaments in two rows. That wrist, with its bands of fibres and its hinged joint, and turning on two axes—on the larger axis moving backward and forward, and on the smaller axis turning nearly 'round. And there is the palm of your hand, with its five bones, each having a shaft and two terminations. There are the fingers of that hand, with fourteen bones, each finger with its curiously-wrought tendons, five of the bones with ending roughened for the lodgment of the nails. There is the thumb, coming from opposite direction to meet the fingers, so that in conjunction they may clasp and hold fast that which you desire to take. There are the long nerves running from the armpit to the forty-six muscles, so that all are under mastery. The whole anatomy of your hand as complex, as intricate, as symmetrical, as useful as God could make it. What can it not do? It can climb, it can lift, it can push, it can repel, it can menace, it can clutch, it can deny, it can affirm, it can extend, it can weave, it can bathe, it can smite, it can humble, it can exalt, it can soothe, it can throw, it can defy, it can wave, it can impreeate, it can pray.

A skeleton of the hand traced on blackboard, or unrolled in diagram, or hung in medical museum, is mightily illustrative of the divine wisdom and goodness, but how much more pleasing when in living action all its nerves and muscles and bones and tendons and tissues and phalanges display what God invented when he invented the human hand. Two specimens of it we carry at our side from the time when in infancy we open them to take a toy, till, in the last hour of a long life we extend them in bitter farewell.

With the Divine help I shall speak of the hand as the chief executive officer of the soul, whether lifted for defense, or extended for help, or busied in the arts, or offered in salutation, or wrung in despair, or spread abroad in benediction. God evidently intended all the lower orders of living beings should have weapons of defense, and hence the elephant's tusk, and the horse's hoof, and the cow's horn, and the lion's tooth, and the insect's sting. Having given weapons of defense to the lower orders of living beings, of course he would not leave man, the highest order of living beings on earth, defenseless and at the mercy of brutal or ruffian attack. The right, yea! the duty, of self-defense is so evident it needs no argumentation. The hand is the divinely fashioned weapon of defense. We may seldom have to use it for such purposes, but the fact that we are so equipped insures safety. The hand is a weapon sooner loaded than any gun, sooner drawn than any sword. Its fingers bent into the palm, it becomes a bolt of demolition. Solomon speaks of the hands as the "keepers of the house," or the defenders. Surely, such a castle as the human body needs such protection as the hand alone can offer.

What a defense it is against accident! There have been times in all our experiences when we have with the hand warded off something that would have extinguished our eyesight, or broken the skull, or crippled us for a lifetime. While the eye has discovered the approaching peril, the hand has beaten it back, or struck it down, or disarmed it. Every day thank God for your right hand, and if you want to hear its eulogy ask him who in swift revolution of machinery has had it crushed, or at Chapultepec or South Mountain or San Juan Hill or Sedan lost it.

And in passing let me say that he who has the weapon of the hand uninjured and in full use needs no other. You cowards who walk with sword-cane or carry a pistol in your hip pocket had better lay aside your deadly weapon. At the frontier, or in barbarous lands, or as an officer of the law about to make arrest, such arming may be necessary, but no citizen moving in these civilized regions needs such reinforcement. If you are afraid to go down these streets or along these country roads without dagger or firearms, better ask your grandmother to go with you armed with scissors and knitting-needle. What cowards, if not what intended murderers, uselessly to carry weapons of death! In our two hands God gave us all the weapons we need to carry.

Again, the hand is the chief executive officer of the soul for affording help. Just see how that hand is constructed. How easily you can lower it to raise the fallen. How easily it is extended to feel the invalid's pulse, or gently wipe away the tear of orphanage, or contribute alms, or smooth the excited brow, or beckon into safety. O, the helping hands! There are hundreds of thousands of them, and the world wants at least sixteen hundred millions of them. Hands to bless others; hands to rescue others; hands to save others. What are all these schools and churches and asylums of mercy? Outstretched hands. What are all those hands distributing tracts, and carrying medicines, and trying to cure blind eyes, and deaf ears, and broken bones, and disordered intellects, and wayward sons? Helping hands. Let each one of us add two to that number, if we have two, or if through casualty only one, add that one. If these hands which we have so long kept thrust into pockets through indolence, or folded in indifference, or employed in writing wrong things or doing mean things, or heaving up obstacles in the way of righteous progress, might from this hour be consecrated to helping others out and up and on, they would be hands worth being raised on the resurrection morn, and worth clapping in eternal gladness over a world redeemed.

The great artists of the ages—Raphael, and Leonardo da Vinci, and Quentin Matsys, and Rembrandt, and Albert Durer, and Titian—have done their best in picturing the face of Christ, but none except Ary Scheffer seems to have put much stress upon the hand of Christ. Indeed, the mercy of that hand, the gentleness of that hand, is beyond all artistic portrayal. Some of his miracles he performed by word of mouth, and without touching the subject before him, but most of them he performed through the hand. Was the dead damsel to be raised to life? "He took her by the hand." Was the blind man to have optic nerve restored? "He took him by the hand." Was the demon to be exorcised from a suffering man? "He took him by the hand." The people saw this, and besought him to put his hand on their afflicted ones.

His own hands free, see how the Lord sympathized with the man who had lost the use of his hand. It was a case of atrophy, a wasting away until the arm and hand had been reduced in size beyond any medical or surgical restoration. Moreover, it was his right hand, the most important of the two, for the left side in all its parts is weaker than the right side, and we involuntarily, in any exigency, put out the right hand because we know it is the best hand. So that poor man had lost more than half of his physical armament. It would not have been so bad if it had been the left hand. But Christ looked at that shriveled-up right hand, dangling uselessly at the man's side, and then cried out with a voice that had omnipotence in it: "Stretch forth thy hand," and the record is, "he stretched it forth whole as the other." The blood rushed through the shrunken veins, and the shortened muscles lengthened, and the dead nerves thrilled, and the lifeless fingers tingled with resumed circulation, and the restored man held up in the presence of the sceptical Pharisees one of Jehovah's masterpieces—a perfect hand. No wonder that story is put three times in the Bible, so that if a sailor were cast away on a barren island, or a soldier's New Testament got mutilated in battle and whole pages are destroyed, the shipwrecked, or wounded man in hospital, would probably have at least one of those three radiant stories of what Christ thought of the human hand.

How often has the hand decided a destiny! Mary Queen of Scots was escaping from imprisonment at Lochlever in the dress of a laundress, and had her face thickly veiled. When a boatman attempted to remove the veil she put up her hand to defend it, and so revealed the white and fair hand of a queen, and so the boatman took her back to captivity. Again and again it has been demonstrated that the hand hath a language as certainly as the mouth. Palmistry, or the science by which character and destiny are read in the lines of the hand, is yet crude and uncertain and unsatisfactory; but as astrology was the mother of astronomy, and alchemy was the mother of chemistry, it may be that palmistry will result in a science yet to be born.

Again, as the chief executive officer of the soul, behold the hand busy in the arts! What a comparatively dull place this world would be without pictures, without statuary, without music, without architecture. Have you ever realized what fifty seeming miracles are in the five minutes' fingering of piano or harp or flute? Who but the eternal God could make a hand capable of that swift sweep of the keys, or that quick feeling of the pulses of a flute, or the twirl of the fingers amid the strings of the harp? All the composers of music who dreamed out the oratorios and the cantatas of the ages would have had their work dropped flat and useless but for the translations of the hand. Under the deft fingers of the performer, what cavalries gallop, and what batteries boom, and what birds carol, and what tempests march, and what oceans billow! The great architects of the earth might have thought out the Alhambras and the Parthenons and the St. Sophias and the Taj Mahals, but all those visions would have vanished had it not been for the hand on hammer, on plummet, on trowel, on wall, on arch, on pillar, on stairs, on dome.

In two discourses, one concerning the ear and the other concerning the eye, I spoke from the potent text in the Psalms: "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear," and "He that formed the eye shall he not see," but what use in the eye and what use in the ear if the hand had not been strung with all its nerves, and moved with all its muscles, and reticulated with all its joints, and strengthened with all its bones, and contrived with all its ingenuities. The hand hath forwarded all the arts, and tunneled the mountains through which the rail-train thunders and launched all the shipping, and fought all the battles, and built all the temples and swung all the cables under the sea as well as lifted to mid-air the wire tracks on which whole trains of thought rush across the continents, and built all the cities and hoisted the Pyramids.

Do not eulogize the eye and ear at the expense of the hand, for the eye may be blotted out, as in the case of Milton, and yet his hand writes a Paradise Lost or a Samson Agonistes; as in the case of William H. Prescott, and yet his hand may write the enchanting Conquest of Peru. Or the ear may be silenced forever, as in the case of Beethoven, and yet his hand may put into immortal cadences the Ninth Symphony. Oh, the hand! The God-fashioned hand! The triumphant hand! It is an open Bible of divine revelation, and the five fingers are the Isaiah, and the Ezekiel, and the David, and the Micah, and the Paul of that almighty inspiration.

A pastor in his sermon told how a little child appreciated the value of his hand when he was told that on the morrow it must be amputated in order to save his life. Hearing that, he went to a quiet place and prayed that God would spare his hand. The surgeon, coming the next day to do his work, found the hand so much better that amputation was postponed, and the hand got well. The pastor, telling of this in a sermon, concluded by holding up his hand and saying: "That is the very hand that was spared in answer to prayer, and I hold it up, a monument of divine mercy."

Again, the hand is the chief executive officer of the soul when wrung in agony. Tears of relief are sometimes denied to trouble. The eyelids at such time are as hot and parched and burning as the brow. At such time even the voice is suppressed, and there is no sob or outcry. Then the wringing of the hand tells the story. At the close of a life wasted in sin sometimes comes that expression of the twisted fingers: the memory of years that will never return, of opportunities the like of which will never again occur, and conscience in its wrath pouncing upon the soul, and all the past a horror, only to be surpassed by the approaching horror. So a man wrings his hands over the casket of a dead wife whom he has cruelly treated. So a man wrings his hands at the fate of sons and daughters whose prospects have been ruined by his inebriety and neglect and depravity. So the sinner wrings his hands when, after a life full of offers of pardon and peace and heaven, he dies without hope. When there are sorrows too poignant for lamentation on the lip, and too hot for the tear-glands to write in letters of crystal on the cheek, the hand recites the tragedy with more emphasis than anything in Macbeth and King Lear.

Worse than the wringing of the hands was the punishment that Cranmer gave his right hand when he put it in the fire of the stake and without flinching, said: "Forasmuch as my hand offended in writing contrary to my heart, my hand shall therefore be the first punished. It shall be the first burned. This was the hand that wrote it."

Again, the hand is the chief executive officer of the soul in salutation. A former President of the United States said: "I think handshaking is a great nuisance and it should be abolished. It not only makes the right arm sore, but shocks the whole system, and unfits a man for writing or attending to other duties. It demoralizes the entire nervous and muscular system." But while this exercise may be fatiguing, it is also an opportunity. He who knows how heartily to shake hands has one of the mightiest arts for conveying happiness and good cheer and life eternal. After you have shaken hands with one, a line of communication is opened that was not open before. Two hands clasped in greeting are a bridge n which all sympathies and kindnesses nd encouragements and blessings cross ver. To shake hands with some persons loes us more good than a sermon—ay! t is a sermon. To shake hands with a ood doctor when we are sick is an ano-lyne, a tonic, a febrifuge before he feels he pulse or writes the prescription. To hake hands with a cheerful man when ve are discouraged, fills us with faith to ry again what we have failed in doing. To shake hands with some consecrated nan, clerical or lay, after we have wan-lered away into sin, is to feel the grasp of Father—God welcoming home the prod-gal. Shake hands, oh ye stolid and ex-lusive and coldblooded and precise and onventional Christians! Jehu cried out o Jehonadab: "Is thine heart right? If t be, give me thine hand."

There is in an honest and Christian andshake a thrill of Gospel electricity. ou take part of his trouble and he takes part of your jubilance. In that way you livide up anxieties and congratulations. The main trunk line of that handshake as branches of blessed telegraphy right own to both hearts and up to both heads, nd you both get the message the same nstant. Take off the glove when you hake hands, for that glove puts the hide f a kid between the palm of your hand nd the palm of his hand, and that ani-nal's hide is a non-conductor of this Gospel electricity. Do not grip the bone f the forefinger and the bone of the little nger with a crushing power that puts ne into a severe suffering which many of s have experienced from those who are nore brutes than men. Take the hand ently, reasonably, heartily, and know hat God ordered that form of salutation. That is one important thing that the hand as made for. You can see the indica-ions in its shape and equipment—the our fingers to take your neighbor's hand n the one side, and the thumb to take it n the other, and the forearm so swung hat you can easily draw it toward you.

Of course, there is a wicked shaking of ands, and Solomon refers to it when he ays: "Though hand join in hand, the vicked shall not be unpunished." Shake ands in conspiracy to damage individual r community or nation; shake hands to defraud; shake hands to stand by each ther in wrongdoing—you help me stuff his ballot-box, and I will see that when I m in power you shall have promotion; ou help me in my infamy and I will help ou in your infamy. Oh, that is profa-nation of a holy rite: that is sacrilege gainst a divine arrangement; that is gripping your own destruction! Pilate nd Herod, though antagonists before, hook hands over Christ's projected as-assination.

But shake hands the way William Penn hook hands with the Indians for their ivilization. Shake hands the way Mis-ionary Carey shook hands with the Hindus, for whose salvation he became a lifetime exile. Shake hands the way Havelock shook hands with besieged women at Lucknow whom he had come o save from massacre. Shake hands as David Brainerd did with the American ndians, whom he offered a glorious heaven through the Gospel. Shake hands as Lincoln shook hands with the agitated nother to whom he gave back the boy who had fallen asleep from overfatigue as a sentinel. Shake hands as during the Civil War Anna Ross shook hands with he wounded soldier in Cooper Shop Hos-pital, Philadelphia. Shake hands as Van Meter, the city evangelist, shook hands with the waif of the street coming peni-tent into the midnight mission. Shake hands as heaven shook hands with earth that night when a doxology in the gallery of clouds woke the Bethlehem shepherds.

But it is not always in such glad greet-ng that we can employ our right hand. Alas, that so often we have to employ the hand in farewell salutation. If your right hand retained some impress of all such ises, it would be a volume of bereave-ments. Oh, the good-by's in which your right hand has participated! Good-by at the steamboat wharf. Good-by at the rail-train window. Good-by at the dy-ng pillow. We all needed grace for such hand-shaking, though our hand was strong and their hand was weak and we will need grace for the coming good-by's, and that grace we had better seek while amid the felicities of health and homes un-broken. Thank God, there will be no good-by in heaven.

Again, the hand is the chief executive of the soul when employed in benediction. No gesture of the human hand means more than that outstretched gesture. In many of our religious denominations we are not permitted to pronounce an apostolic benediction until we have been regularly ordained as ministers of the Gospel; but there are kinds of benediction that you may all pronounce without especial permission from Presbytery or Conference or Convention. You have a right to spread abroad both right hand and left hand in bestowing a blessing of kindness and good-will upon all you meet. With both hands bless the children. Take them in your arms and kiss their fair cheek. Take with them a round of merriment in the room before you leave it; and by prayer put them in the arms of that Christ, to go to whom in olden time they struggled to get out of the arms of their mothers. God bless the cradles and high-chairs and nurseries all 'round the world.

Extend your hands in benediction for the aged. Take their counsel and ask their prayers, and smooth the path down the declivities. By neglect and unfilial demeanor add no wrinkles to their brow, no more stoop to their shoulders. They have their hand on the latch of the door through which they will soon go out of sight of your homes and churches. May the mantles of the Elijahs fall upon the Elishas! Spread your hand for the benediction upon all the men and women in the tug-of life, many of them tired and buffeted and disheartened. Never go out of a store or shop or office or field without pronouncing a benediction.

And what better use can I make of my hands, which are the chief executive officers of my soul, than now to spread them abroad in the apostolic benediction which has been pronounced for centuries, and over hundreds of thousands of assemblages at coronations and obsequies, at harvest-homes and on fast-days, by all the ministers of the Gospel in the past as it will be by all the ministers of the Gospel until the Church militant reaches up its right hand to take the right hand of the Church triumphant; a benediction which, when it has full sway, will leave nothing for our world to want, or heaven to bestow: "May the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all forever. Amen."

A Perfect Gift

What Our American Consul at Jerusalem Thinks of the Red Letter New Testament

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

JERUSALEM, Syria, Dec. 24, 1899.

Dear Friend and Brother Klopsch:— How pleased I was to receive your letter of Nov. 17. With it came two books, and the mail of yesterday, fifteen days later than the first, brought a third book from you. Many, many thanks. The Rulers of the World at Home is very useful. Several persons have seen it already and think it is excellent. The Choice Pieces of American Literature is excellent. It was only received and opened last evening. The first thing I read was Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg. My wife says, "That is a capital picture of Sarah Orne Jewett." I have known Miss Jewett since she was a young girl.

But the smallest book, your third gift, the Red Letter New Testament, is the best of all. It went into service the very next morning, at our family prayers—there are two of us, you know, my wife and myself—yet we are old-fashioned enough to have family prayers every morning.

I always wanted just such a book. Have thought of several plans as to how one could be made, but it came to me ready-made for my Christmas present from a dear friend, yourself, at the last Christmas but one of this century. How singular! I should have prized such a book if made by anyone else, but it is doubly valuable to me because you arranged it yourself. I have shown it to several friends, English as well as American. They all like it. The book is so neat, the work so perfect and attractive, the interest in it is so precious, I want to thank you over and over for giving this little volume to the world.

Very few travelers come this season because of the quarantine. That has been reduced to two days and we hope for its entire removal soon. I wish you could visit Jerusalem while we are here.

I fear my letter is too long; but I must say how interested I am in all your great work—noble, helpful. Everything you undertake seems the "best thing you ever did." May the Lord bless you always.

Yours sincerely, SELAH MERRILL,
U. S. Consul.

To Preach Christ in Far Fields

Many Newly Appointed Missionary Workers for Cuba, the Philippines and India

THE moral and spiritual conquest of the Philippines is a much greater and more important question than the military subjugation of these many tribes by our army and navy. Among the missionary societies that have planned to send the Gospel of light and liberty to these, our fellow men, in darkness and bondage, is the Foreign Christian Missionary Society of the Disciples of Christ, at Cincinnati. When the Spanish-American War broke out, the Rev. Herman P. Williams, a young pastor of the Church of the Disciples of Christ, at Ames, Ia., enlisted with Co. A, which afterward became the 51st Iowa Regiment. Shortly after enlisting he was appointed chaplain, and served in the Philippines until mustered out Oct. 2, 1899. Before leaving for the East with his regiment, he was married to Miss Beulah McFarland who accompanied him across the sea. Their experience and observations in and about Manila, fit them admirably for the missionary service for which they will return to these islands to do. They are now under appointment by the Foreign Missionary Society, and are making special preparation for their work by taking a short course of study at the Chicago University. Mr. Williams is a native of Iowa City, Ia., and is a son of one of the oldest and best known ministers in the State. He was educated at the State University and at Drake Divinity School in his native State, and for seven years he has been a faithful preacher of the Gospel. His wife has been actively engaged in Young Women's Christian Association work. After taking the literary degree of Ph.B. at the Iowa State College, she taught in the high school of Iowa City for a time before her marriage. Both Mr. and Mrs. Williams are anxious to return and preach the Gospel to the people of the Philippines.

MR. AND MRS. C. S. WEAVER

MRS. H. P. WILLIAMS

The same mission board has also selected Mr. and Mrs. Clifford S. Weaver, students in the senior class at Eureka College, Eureka, Ill., to go to the Manila field. Mr. Weaver is the son of an able minister at Texarkana. Though now but twenty-six years of age he has been preaching the Gospel nine years. His wife (formerly Miss Gussie Carson), is also under appointment to go as a missionary to Manila. She was educated at Knox College and Kentucky University, and afterward was for two years State Secretary of the Illinois Christian Woman's Board of Missions among the Disciples of Christ. She is now State Secretary of the Young People's work in the churches of Illinois. She has had a strong desire to work for the Master in foreign fields since becoming a Christian, twelve years ago.

Rev. Lowell C. McPherson, who for six years has been pastor of the Jefferson Street Church of the Disciples of Christ, Buffalo, has recently resigned to become for a young, energetic, zealous worker to take charge of the work in Cuba, the society finally fixed upon the Rev. Mr. McPherson. He and his wife accepted the call. Both are natives of Illinois, both attended Eureka College and afterward Garfield University. After three years of successful work at Atchison, Kan., they came to Buffalo in 1893; Mr. McPherson took charge of the Jefferson St. Church with only eighty members. It now has about 500 and one of the best of Sunday Schools. He has the largest Chinese class in the city. His wife is State President of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Mr. and Mrs. McPherson will locate in Havana.

The Christian Woman's Board of Missions has met with so much success in their Bible chair enterpises in the Universities of Michigan, Virginia and Georgia, that they have decided to extend its blessings to institutions of learning in foreign lands, and have planned to begin with the colleges of Calcutta, the great educational centre of India. The mission board has selected two men to undertake this work, whose training and experience qualify them for a high grade of service. Rev. N. M. Ragland, pastor of the Church of the Disciples of Christ at Fayetteville, Ark., will go as one of the teachers and preachers under this commission. Mr. Ragland has labored with great success for fifteen years among the students of the Arkansas State University at Fayetteville. For several years he has been State Superintendent of Christian Endeavor work among his denomination in Arkansas. The other Bible chair instructor who has been chosen is the Rev. W. M. Forrest, pastor of the Church of the Disciples at Ann Arbor, Michigan. Among the students of the University of Michigan he has done excellent work, serving during the last three years as a Biblical lecturer and instructor under the auspices of the Ann Arbor English Bible Chair. In establishing this Bible Lectureship for the students of India, Calcutta has been selected because it is the most important educational seat of all Asia. It has seventy-four high schools, twenty-four colleges and the University of Calcutta. The University examines 10,000 students every year. The majority of these students are in Hindoo, Mohammedan or government colleges, where there is no Christian instruction given. These students use the English language and many of them are eager to pursue studies in this tongue.

.. Fireside Talks About Jesus ..

Jesus and Nicodemus

A Story of the Night Interview
By Dr. and Mrs Wilbur F. Crafts

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 11th. JOHN 3: 1-18

UNCLE WILL: "Miracles are divine bells by which God used to call men to hear some new messenger he had sent.

Nicodemus told Jesus he had been thus called. As yet, so far as the record shows, Jesus had wrought only two miracles. The changing of water to wine in far-off Cana, which proclaimed Jesus Lord of nature, may have been reported in Jerusalem by the Galileans who had just come to the Passover. In any case, a man like Nicodemus would have been still more impressed by the second miracle, wrought in Jerusalem itself, about which the whole city was excited—the cleansing of the temple by the expulsion of its covetous and dishonest money-changers—a miracle that showed Jesus to be Lord of human nature. It is not to be supposed that he used the whip of small cords except upon the cattle and with them not to hurt, but only as a hint. Christ is no advocate of the whipping-post that he should use a whip upon men. For them his look was enough—that look which at two other times made mobs fall back or fall to the ground. No sooner had Nicodemus referred to these miracles upon matter and mind, than Jesus proclaimed the greater miracle of conversion, which changes wickedness into righteousness and cleanses the temple of the heart—a miracle that he declared himself ready to work in the heart of Nicodemus himself: 'Ye must be born again.'"

"HOW CAN A MAN BE BORN WHEN HE IS OLD?"

"How that must have startled Elder Nicodemus, who was also a Supreme Court Judge," said Selah Brown. "Intellectually, he was of the kind that, having been born in Boston, think they have no need to be born again; and, religiously, he was not only a church member, but a ruling elder and leading layman of the kind we send to the General Assembly. He thought he was already a large part of the Kingdom of God, and to tell him he 'couldn't see it' even—well, well! Imagine an evangelist inviting a senior elder to go forward for prayers!"

Unconverted Members

Uncle Will: "When I was a pastor in a church which I had served a year, I invited a man to 'rise for prayers' in a revival meeting, who indignantly replied that he was 'a member of the church.' I said that I had no apology to make, for I had seen no evidence of it, and did not propose to hunt up old records to find out what ought to be shown by Christian activities. In another case, I incidentally spoke of a man as a church member while talking to a young lady. She exclaimed in surprise: 'I have boarded in the family seven years, and never suspected it before.' One pastor announced a sermon 'to the unconverted members of the church.' That would be a proper title for this first sermon of Christ, preached like seventeen other sermons in John, to a single hearer. What a value Jesus set on the individual soul in giving his very best words to an audience of one!"

"And how unmistakably," said Sanders, "Jesus showed that every soul must be born from above when he said that such a work was needed even by such a churchman as Nicodemus. He was manifestly not of the covetous and hypocritical sort of Pharisees, for the attack of Jesus upon that class had won his approval. He was a Pharisee of the Puritan type, and that means no small degree of devotion, including the paying of one-tenth of income to God, besides numerous free-will offerings. Nicodemus represents pew-holders on the broad aisle who give largely in money and time and ceremonies to the church, but all in the spirit of a servant earning rewards, knowing nothing of the personal love and joy of sonship, and looking at even religious matters from the material standpoint too common in boards of trustees."

"GOD SO LOVED"

Uncle Will: "Jesus in one profound word shows that the new birth is not an arbitrary law of spiritual naturalization, which might have been different, but rests on the great law of moral necessity, often revealed in such nots of character as follows: 'What must I do to be saved?' Ye must be born again. 'They that are in the flesh can not please God.'"

Frank: "Uncle Will, can you tell what conversion is, so that little fellows like me can undertand it?"

Mrs. Uncle Will: "May I answer with a story of a boy of ten—just your age, Frank? In a certain church the elders met to examine those who wanted to join the church. When all the grown-ups had been examined and gone away there remained in the corner a boy of ten that the elders had thought up till then was only waiting to go home with some of the older people, for, unfortunately, that church had acted on the theory that the lambs should be kept outside the fold amid wolves and winds till they grew to be old sheep. The senior elder asked the boy in a not very encouraging tone of surprise: 'Do you wish to join the church?' 'If you please, sir.' 'Do you hope your sins are forgiven?' 'I know they are.' The elders looked at each other suspiciously, for in that church they only 'indulged a hope,' and with not much even of that, were wont to sing:

'Tis a point I long to know—
Do I love the Lord or no?

'How do you know,' said the senior elder to the boy, 'that Jesus has forgiven you?' 'Because he said he would. 'If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.' We do not 'hope' that Jesus will keep that promise; we know that if we do our part in confessing our sins, with a purpose to forsake them, he will do his part in cleansing our hearts. To cherish a hope is really to cherish a doubt."

Reefs of Truth

Uncle Will: "In the shadow of the Cross and in this lesson, which sets conversion and the Cross side by side, let me read the profound yet clear interpretation of both by Dr. Joseph Cook: 'A certain soul with which I have a better acquaintance than with any other human spirit, was once rocked on dark, unresting seas. At last this tossed mariner planted his feet not on one reef of self-evident truth, but on several. He came to this reef where Bushnell knelt, and also to this other reef, that a man must really love what God loves, and hate what God hates, or he cannot be at peace in his presence; must absolutely have similarity of feeling with God, or the universe will be against him; must, in short, have the new birth or there can be no harmony between his faculties, nor between his soul and the rest of the universe. He came also upon the perfectly self-evident truth that the past cannot be erased, that a record of sin once made cannot be blotted out even by omnipotence. It may be screened, but any amount of effort on the man's part to change the past is impotent, and omnipotence itself cannot make what has been not to have been, and so the necessity not only of the new birth, but of the atonement was made clear. Yielding to what those truths taught, there came a star into the soul. From that hour, however the ocean has lashed the reefs, however the billows have endeavored at times to overtop their barriers, there has been for that soul only peace in the mornings and the midnights, only peace in the sunshine and the storm, and where that soul found peace in life, it also expects to find peace in death.'"

Ruth Sanders: "I have been for years collecting stories of conversions due to that text, of which the whole Bible is the sermon, 'God so loved the world.' Here are three of them:

"A certain minister was informed that during one of his sermons of the previous Sabbath a woman of his parish had been led to become a Christian. He called at her house and found it even so. Then he said to her, 'May I ask you what particular passage in my sermon produced such a blessed effect on your mind?' 'The sermon! It was not the sermon; it was the text, the blessed text, 'God so loved the world.'

"A missionary said to a heathen, 'Do your gods love you?' 'Our gods never think of loving.' 'Then hear this: 'God so loved the world.' Only when it had been read again and again was the heathen able to take it to himself.

The Dying Gypsy Boy

"A company of Gypsies had encamped near a large town. A good lady, doing her Master's work, asked permission to enter one of the vans, and, after some delay, she was allowed to do so. She found inside a poor boy lying upon a wretched bed and evidently at the very point of death. She spoke to him kindly, but received no answer. Then stooping down, she whispered in his ear the old verse, 'God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' There was no reply. A second time she repeated it, and a second time there was no answer; a third time, kneeling down she whispered in his ear the same verse, and then the eyes, already glazing in death, opened the thin white lips moved and the answer slowly came, 'Nobody ever told me this before, but thank Him kindly for it.'"

THE DYING GIPSY BOY

Mrs. Uncle Will: "A gentleman was addressing a mission school, where most of the scholars were quite young. He asked the question, 'Does Jesus love good children or bad children?' 'Good children,' was the quick reply. 'Yes,' said the gentleman, 'but doesn't Jesus love bad children also?' Instantly a little fellow, not more than six or seven years old, replied, 'Jesus loves every kind.'

"Edmund, four years old, had been looking at the statue, Thorwalsden's Christ, with the prints of the nails in the hands and feet. He came to me, looked into my face with a sweet smile, and said, 'Aren't you glad Jesus was killed on the cross?' 'Why no,' I answered, quite shocked. 'You ought to be,' he answered, 'for if he hadn't been, you could not go to heaven.'"

Uncle Will: "After all, the great thing to learn is not only to accept the unspeakable gift of God's love, but to have the same divine love shed abroad in our hearts. That does not mean that we should love God, but that we should love like him. It is easy to love God, the altogether lovely. It is not easy to love our enemies, which is loving the unlovely, as God loves when he loves us, loving according to needs and not according to merits."

"I can't love God even as I love mother," said Mabel, "and I surely can't love girls that hate me as I love them that love me."

Three Kinds of Love

Mrs. Uncle Will: "It will help you to know that there are three kinds of love: First, the love of esteem that looks up, the love with which we love God; second, the love of sympathy, the love that looks straight out, with which we love those we like; third, the love of compassion, the most difficult of all, that looks down, the love with which we love those distasteful and hostile to us. This is Godlike love, for in loving men he loves the unlovely and unfriendly. While enemies drove the nails through Christ's hands, he prayed, 'Father, forgive them; they know not what they do.' He saw them as brothers wronging themselves in wronging him."

"Faith is friendship," said Mrs. Brown. "It is not believing creed, or church or any 'it', but 'believing on Him.'"

"And the eternal life," said Mr. Isaacs, "is not the future life, but the life that dates from the new birth when we begin to really live. As we date the years of the world from the birth of Christ, so we reckon our personal lives as begun anew in the new birth of Christ in us. As the Nile has transformed the desert into the most fertile land in the world by its overflow, so the inflowing of Christ fills us with noble life.

CONVERSION, NOT CONFIRMATION ONLY, REQUIRED ALIKE BY THE STANDARDS OF JEWS AND CHRISTIANS (BOTH CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT).—"Create unto me a clean heart, O God! and a firm spirit renew thou within me."—Psalm 51: 12, in Rabbi Leeser's Jewish Translation.

"That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the Spirit, is spirit." "Wonder not that I said unto thee: Ye must be born again."—John 3: 6, 7, in the Douay (Catholic) Translation.

"And be not fashioned according to this world: but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind."—Romans 11: 2, in the Revised Version (Protestant).

"You ask me how I gave my heart to Christ!
I do not know.
There came a yearning for him in my soul.
So long ago.
I found earth's flowerets would fade and die,
I wept for something that could satisfy;
And then—and then somehow I seemed to dare
To lift my broken heart to him in prayer.
I do not know,
I cannot tell you how—
I only know
He is my Saviour now.

Paris Donning Her Gala Garb

To Welcome the World's Millions — Visitors Already Crowding in — The Palaces and the Gardens

VIEW OF THE ESPLANADE OF THE INVALIDES

THE "LITTLE PALACE OF ART"

WITH the beginning of the New Year, Paris takes on the appearance of the city soon to be hostess to the world's millions. Pensions (as the Parisian boarding-houses are called) are filling up, and rooms are being engaged in advance. The registry of foreigners with the Prefecture of Police is the most eloquent prophecy of Exposition crowds; according to law, each foreigner purposing a stay of over three months, must report himself for this sort of enrollment; and the records already show extraordinary accessions.

President Loubet has been visiting the Exposition work-yards; the French Commissioners have been pushing matters forward with increasing zeal; most of the palaces are nearly, if not entirely, ready for their final interior equipments. When the gates swing open, April 15, 1900, the entire scheme—except perhaps for the placing of a few foreign exhibits—will doubtless be complete. The horticultural effects are to be a distinguishing feature. M. Laforcade, Chief Gardener of Paris, and his band of over a hundred gardeners, have been at work on a plan which will transform the "City on the Seine" into a veritable bower of greenery and blossom when springtime, and with it all the world comes to Paris. About $125,000,000 are to be expended upon horticultural embellishments of the grounds; besides, Mr. Vacherot, Director of Parks and Gardens to the Exposition, has arranged to borrow thousands of rare plants from the Royal Gardens and Conservatories of the municipality. Perfect forests have been planted on the Champ de Mars; this garden and those of the Elysee and the Esplanade des Invalides will have for the centre or climax of their loveliness the great electric fountain in front of that abode of twentieth century enchantment—the Palace of Electricity. No nation has contributed more than our own to the development of electrical science, and Americans should feel particularly at home among the mysteries and marvels to be displayed here.

Paris did not have, as Chicago, a prairie on which to raise her Exposition scheme: and all of those visitors who expect to see anything like the "White City" will be disappointed. Paris has been obliged to scatter her buildings more or less along the banks of the Seine, and among old and stately structures, so that as one walks along he determines that this or that building is for Exposition purposes, by its newness. The French know how to utilize every bit of nature, and the Seine will become a sort of "Grand Canal" of the Fair; boats loaded with visitors will dart over its waters by day and night—in the latter case under very rainbows of electric light—and many visitors will go by the river to Versailles, St. Cloud and the Bois de Boulogne, and return, refreshed by the short and inexpensive trips to renewed sight-seeing in the Exposition. Sixty millions, according to the estimates made, will pass under the graceful and wide-springing arches of the Grand Monumental Entrance between the opening and the closing days. The Grand and Little Palaces of Art, which are to be permanent memorials of this Fair and which will house the finest specimens of the world's sculpture and paintings, are the most notable buildings of the Fair of 1900; and what the Eiffel Tower was to the Exposition of 1889, the beautiful and massive Alexander III. Bridge may be to the present Exposition—its distinctive architectural feature. This bridge unites the plot taken from the City Park system to the Esplanade des Invalides. The series of palaces on the Esplanade will be occupied chiefly by manufacturing and other industrial exhibits. Many notable assemblages will be held in the La Salle des Fetes.

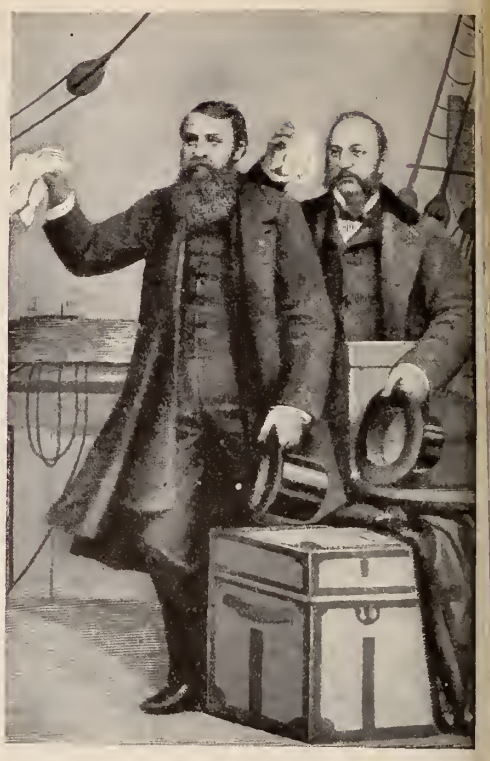
Mr. Edgar Wilson Hawley Continues His Reminiscences of the Great Evangelist—His Great Faith and His Zeal for Souls



MOODY AND SANKEY LEAVING ENGLAND IN '73

II.

AT a time when every authentic incident and anecdote relating to the life and work of Dwight L. Moody is doubly precious, a second chapter of reminiscences by Mr. Edgar Wilson Hawley, Mr. Moody's old-time friend and associate, dealing with the early career of the great evangelist, will be read with unusual interest. These reminiscences, like the first, are given, as nearly as possible, in Mr. Hawley's own language.

How Moody Ran the Guard

"In the early part of the Civil War we had a large camp of instruction in the suburbs of Chicago called Camp Douglas. At one time there were about 12,000 men there. Regiments were coming in and others going to the front all the time. The Y. M. C. A. had a chapel among the men, where meetings were held. The Western branch of the Christian Commission included among its members J. B. Farwell, B. F. Jacobs, Mr. Moody, and several others. We issued an Army Hymn Book with an American flag on the front page, and it was used freely among the soldiers. We visited the tents and barracks and found the men playing cards. We proposed to exchange our hymn-books for the cards, and the soldiers agreed quickly enough; indeed, so numerous were those exchanges that several of the Y. M. C. A. rooms were literally full of playing cards which the men had surrendered. This camp was finally struck, the men having all gone to the war. General Grant had captured Fort Donelson and taken 10,000 Confederate prisoners, of whom about 9,000 were sent to Chicago and placed in the barracks with a regiment of our men as guards. It was a period of popular apprehension, and the people of the city were very nervous. A week afterward, at the close of a Union prayer-meeting, Moody said to me: 'Hawley, let us go down and hold a meeting there in the chapel with the prisoners.' It was about five miles down to the camp, and as we got near the entrance, Moody said: 'Hawley, here is a ministerial pass—take it.' 'But how will you get in past the guard?' I asked. 'In some way' was the confident reply. The guard passed me right in, but Moody was halted by the fixed bayonets. 'Stand back!' came the stern order of the guard. 'I am Moody, the president of the Y. M. C. A.,' he explained to the soldier. 'I don't care who you are; you can't get in here!' At that moment a captain who was passing, stepped up and recognized the evangelist. To him Moody appealed. 'Let me in,' he urged, 'for the work's sake.' The officer turned to the guard: 'Let one of your men take Mr. Moody to headquarters; I will be responsible.' We marched in, Moody under military guard. On the matter being explained at headquarters, the officer in charge said: 'Well, seeing you are here and knowing your object, you may stay, but don't repeat it. If you are not out of here by 8 P. M., you go into the guard-house for the night.' We went to the chapel, arranged things and invited the men. It was soon packed full. Turning to me with a twinkle in his eye, Moody said: 'Now, Hawley, you preach.' I remonstrated and said I wasn't a minister. 'But you came in on a ministerial pass and I didn't', he persisted. So I quietly acquiesced and we had an interesting service. In the evening, Mr. Moody took charge and it seemed as though the Spirit of the Lord came down on that service and upon those men with great power. They came forward to the altar, twenty, thirty, forty at a time. We closed the meeting and began inquiry work. Moody had the platform and God used him wonderfully. The whole audience melted down and we could see strong men in tears. Moody whispered to me: 'God is here!'

"We looked at our watches. It wanted but a few seconds of eight and we had to run to get out of camp, having no notion of passing a night in the guard-house. These meetings we kept up two or three weeks and many were converted. We formed a Y. M. C. A. branch at the camp and there were many kind expressions of gratitude even from high officers who were greatly pleased with the work.

His First Sunday School Work

"I went to Chicago in '58 and engaged in the clothing business, but as my heart was in the Lord's work, I gave to mission work a good deal of my time and energy. During the following spring I became acquainted with Mr. Moody, who was then about twenty-two years old. This was the beginning of an intimate friendship of over forty years. I remember one Sunday I was out on the North Side at a mission school on North Wells and Chicago avenue. The superintendent said to me: 'We have a wonderful young fellow here. He came a few Sundays ago and wanted a class. I told him: 'I haven't a class for you, but I have a place for one.' Next Sunday he was here with twelve or fifteen boys he had picked up.' But that school was too slow for Mr. Moody; in less than six months he got possession of North Market Hall, and the school he established there came to be known by that name. The authorities gave him the building rent free, and there he did some noble work.

"He was full of zeal for Christ. He went to clergymen to propose aggressive Christian work, and was disappointed to find them indifferent and unresponsive. Among the Christian laity he found the same conditions. Gradually his indomitable zeal gathered around him a strong working force of laymen and ministers.

"About this time he was actively connected with a Congregational church on the North Side, where he hired five pews, and filled them with young men. His own speaking at that time was rather crude, and the good brethren thought he did more harm than good by his talks, so they advised him to keep his pews filled rather than to attempt to speak. Their meetings were too slow for Moody, and he went to some good brother and asked him if, at the next meeting, he would not get up and be the first to speak. He said he would. Mr. Moody then went to others and engaged three to be the second speakers and three others to be third. When the first man had spoken, the others followed, several rising at once. This unusual sight inspired the meeting with the enthusiasm of a revival, and was really the beginning of a great quickening of spiritual interest in the church.

Zeal for Souls Rewarded

"A two-days' Sunday School convention was to be held in Princeton township, Bureau county, Ill., and well known speakers had been invited for the occasion. Mr. Moody wanted to go and urged me to do so also. We were to be among the 'lesser lights.' We went, but for various reasons none of the 'distinguished speakers' appeared. We reached Princeton at three o'clock, on a bitterly cold morning, and on finding our way to the hotel sat for a little while by the stove. Finally, Moody, who had been quietly thinking, said: 'Let us go and pray?' Turning to the clerk, he asked: 'Can you give us a room?' 'Yes; you can go up to No. ——.' We did so, and pulled off the bed coverings, and wrapping ourselves up in them to keep off the chill, we knelt down to pray. The task before us seemed to be a great burden; but we had both come straight from Sunday School revival work, and were confident that the Lord would open the way somehow. When morning dawned, the other speakers were still absent and we felt greatly worried. We visited the public schools and several other schools, and invited the young people to come to the afternoon meeting. One school we reached at recess and spoke briefly to the pupils. In the afternoon meeting, in the church, we both felt assured that God would bless our efforts. Moody observed a little white building off on the road and on inquiring of a young worker named Richardson who was assisting us, he was told that it was Smith's schoolhouse. 'Well,' he said, 'you go and see if we can't use it after the meeting. Have it heated. We shall want it for inquiry meetings. His confident tone surprised us, but the matter was arranged as he directed. When the Convention assembled, and when we were both on the platform, Moody turned to me and said: 'Hawley, you speak first. I'll pray while you are speaking, and you do the same while I speak.' For twenty minutes I spoke and the audience gave the closest attention. Then Moody spoke fully half an hour, and his eloquent words produced an impression such as had never before been felt in Princeton township. There was a hush over the whole audience and many were in tears. The power of God was there. Moody closed his remarks with prayer, after which he asked those who desired the blessing of the Spirit to rise. Nearly all rose. On his knees he prayed for their souls, while tears ran down his own cheeks. He rose from his knees and said: 'All of you who are not Christians and who want to settle the matter to-day are invited to go over to Smith's school. Soon the sidewalk was full of people going to the inquiry meeting. Seventy-one persons were crowded into the little space besides Moody, Richardson and myself. The service opened with a Bible reading: 'Ho, every man that thirsteth,' and the prayer and invitation were followed by a wonderful surrender of hearts, many persons kneeling, uttering short prayers, and weeping copiously. All were questioned. Sixty-eight took part audibly in the service. It grew dark and lights were brought in, but still they remained. Time passed but nobody wanted to go home. The meeting did not close until the bells were ringing for the evening session of the convention. Moody said: 'Hawley, God is showing us what he will do for us if we will let him. Give up your business and join me in this work. We will go through the length and breadth of the State and hold meetings in the different towns.' My business arrangements at that time, however, prevented this. I remember, afterward, a very striking remark by Colonel Hammond, to Mr. Moody, when he was told about this wonderful work. 'Young man,' said the veteran evangelist solemnly, 'Honor the Holy Ghost! You have told me what you and Hawley did. You have not said anything about the Spirit of God.'

"There is where I first felt the power showing what God would do through a man if he will let him."

The Great English Revival

An English writer gives this interesting reminiscence of the evangelist: "The death of Mr. Moody will recall to many the extraordinary enthusiasm that his first crusade in England evoked in 1873. I can well remember the overflowing houses which responded to the ministrations of Moody and Sankey in those days, and how the largest halls were filled to overflowing. Mr. Moody, had an extraordinary gift of simple, convincing earnestness, which could not fail to impress, and his influence was little less than marvelous. He was greatly assisted in his ministrations by his colleague and friend, Ira D. Sankey. London was full of revivals at that time, and in the West End the meetings were perhaps larger and more enthusiastic than elsewhere."

. . . Round Top . . .

WHEN next across the dreaming lands,
Shall pass the reverent pilgrim bands,
At sunset's hour to meet and pray
To him who guardeth night and day,
Our Greatheart, lifted out of sight,
No more with giant blows shall smite
The evil, hated of his Lord;
No more shall wield a two-edged sword
Against the swarming hosts of ill;
Or tenderly our souls shall thrill
With story of the Saviour's love,
Told oft those kneeling ranks above.

There where we saw him, gentle, mild,
As simple as a little child,
We shall not see his like again
Among the breathing world of men.
'Tis meed that his last bed is made
Beneath the dappled summer shade,
Beneath the steadfast open sky,
Where mountain winds may pass it by,
And star and sun their long watch keep Where lies our Greatheart fast asleep.

For often there shall prayer and praise
Be heard in coming happy days;
From far and near the tribes go up
And blessings brim the pilgrim's cup.
And Round Top nearer seems to God,
Since he, the narrow way who trod
And kept so near the Master, lies Within its breast, beneath the skies.

The Situation In South Africa

DISPATCHES from the seat of war show that up to the close of the third week in January, the decisive battle which was expected to take place on the north bank of the Tugela, had not been fought. The Boers for strategical, or other reasons, have not offered serious opposition to the slow advance of Gen. Buller. He, on his side, appears to have been content with keeping their centre occupied, while awaiting the result of the flank movement by Gen. Warren. It is obvious that if Gen. Warren can drive in the Boer right, he will render a combined attack by Gen. Buller and Gen. White far more formidable than any movement hitherto directed against the Boer forces. His work, however, is arduous, as well as dangerous. One despatch says that it is uphill all the way and the country is of the broken, rocky character, which the Boers turn to account in masking their batteries. After two days' almost continuous fighting, the British forces had advanced only two miles and the main position of the Boers had not been reached. It is sure to be stubbornly defended and the attack upon it will probably prove to be the decisive battle of the war. In the meantime the garrison at Ladysmith is suffering heavily. The Boers continue their bombardment and they have an ally in the enteric fever which is reducing Gen. White's forces. It is evident that the garrison has undergone severe privations and it may not now be in condition to render material aid to the army that is trying to come to its succor. The Boers appear to take that view of the situation, for in retiring, they take up a position south of Ladysmith, which they would not do if they apprehended a sortie being made by Gen. White's army. On the Modder river there has been little change in the situation. No attempt has been made to advance toward Kimberley which is known to be in urgent need of help. No disposition is manifested on either side to abandon the awful struggle, but rather increased determination to fight to the bitter end. That the closing year of the nineteenth century should be marked by a conflict so brutalizing is a sad commentary on the ineradicable passions of the human race, which after so many generations is still so far from heeding the warning of the Prince of Peace.

A MULE-TRAIN CROSSING THE VELDT

They that take the sword shall perish with the sword (Matt. 26:52).

John Ruskin Dead

When the history of the nineteenth century comes to be written by some future historian, who would take account of the movements which had their rise in it, a place of no small significance will be given to the influence of John Ruskin. The English-speaking peoples on both sides the Atlantic and in the colonies of the Southern Hemisphere have even yet no conception of the extent to which that influence has affected them. For about forty years his voice, like that of one of the ancient prophets, rang out among his people, denouncing lies and hypocrisy and materialism and everything that was base and sordid in their lives. Its tones were so sweet, its written words so graceful and pungent, that public attention was enchained, and even those who were arraigned could not but admire. The voice has been silent during the past fifteen years, and the mighty brain has been clouded; but when on Jan. 21, the cable flashed the news of his death, there was a general sense that the world had lost one of its noblest souls. It is fifty-seven years since his countrymen, reading the first volume of Modern Painters, realized that a new teacher had arisen. Ruskin was then twenty-four years old, his Oxford studies just concluded and he entering on his career. Endowed with an ample fortune inherited from his father, a wealthy wine-merchant, he devoted himself to the study of art. He set himself to the education of the public taste, showing the beauty of nature and inculcating that truth and fidelity to nature which, as he contended, alone constituted the true mission of the painter. Gradually, he was led into the paths of social reform and became a teacher of righteousness, justice to the laborer, and compassion for the afflicted. He taught the dignity of labor and satirized the class distinctions which are based on wealth. His social teachings were not received with the same favor as those on art had been. They were regarded as the dreams of an enthusiast, but Ruskin never faltered in his message. He uttered it, whether men would hear or whether they would forbear, and he sacrificed his own fortune in his efforts to give a practical example of his theories. Since 1886, when he resigned his professorship at Oxford, he has lived in retirement among his art treasures in his home at Coriston. On his eightieth birthday, which was celebrated last year, his disciples and admirers sent him a testimonial of their affection which was signed by the most distinguished men of the land, as well as by a host of humble workers who loved and reverenced him. Nothing, however, pleased him so much as any evidence that reached his ears that his countrymen were giving heed in some practical way to the message which, like the great apostle, he had so persistently urged upon them:

Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things (Phil. 4: 8).

An Interesting Experiment

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, of Topeka, Kan., the well-known author of In His Steps, will shortly undertake an experiment which, from its very novelty, is certain to attract general attention. Mr. Sheldon—whose test question, "What would Jesus do?" he believes in applying to all the affairs of life, last year made an appeal to the Christian Endeavor Convention for a million dollars, with which he proposed to establish a daily newspaper, to be conducted as nearly as possible in accordance with Christ's own teachings. At that time, the appeal brought no response; but, to his surprise, a few weeks ago, the owners and editors of The Topeka Capital, announced their willingness to turn over the entire plant and staff of that newspaper to Mr. Sheldon for one week, during which time he might make the experiment of publishing a daily journal, which should in all respects embody his ideas of what a Christian newspaper should be. For six days he will be practically absolute in ownership and management, dictating the policy as well as controlling the news and advertising columns of the paper. Mr. Sheldon has accepted this generous offer, and as his control will doubtless be marked by the most radical and vigorous Christian policy, the result will be everywhere watched with intense interest. As the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, already know much of Rev. Mr. Sheldon's Christlike work in the West, and his consistent and fearless advocacy of the daily imitation of Jesus by all professing to be his followers, they will naturally be attracted by this unique experiment. On learning of the arrangement, the proprietor of this journal immediately telegraphed to the editor of The Topeka Capital:

We compliment your commendable enterprise in offering use of your paper to Dr. Sheldon. Our CHRISTIAN HERALD readers will follow the experiment with great interest. Please wire exact date when Dr. Sheldon will begin, also what sum we may invite our readers to send you for the six papers issued under his generalship?

LOUIS KLOPSCH.

To this the following was received:

Thanks for your kind expressions about Sheldon edition. Begins March 13. For entire six Sheldon issues, send 25 cents, same as any six regular issues. TOPEKA CAPITAL.

This is a great opportunity for Mr. Sheldon to show how a newspaper may fulfil its functions, while upholding the principles of Christianity. It is an opportunity that the Psalmist coveted:

That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving and tell of all thy wondrous works (Ps. 26: 7).

GEN. WHITE'S HEADQUARTERS IN LADYSMITH

Roberts under Ban

The reports of the special committee appointed to consider the case of Mr. Roberts, whom Utah elected as one of its representatives in Congress, are a distinct triumph for law and order. The majority, including Mr. Tayler, of Ohio, the Chairman of the Committee, are of opinion that the House has the right to prevent his taking his seat. The minority recommend that Mr. Roberts be admitted and sworn in, and then be expelled under the power which the House has of punishing its members for a violation of the laws. Whether the House takes the one course or the other does not signify greatly to Mr. Roberts, inasmuch as both deprive him of the right to participate in legislation. It is gratifying to see that the movement, initiated by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD months ago, has received the endorsement of the Special Committee. It would have been a most humiliating scandal to have had an open breaker of the law seated without protest among the lawmakers of the nation.

MR. BRIGHAM H. ROBERTS

Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God (Rom. 2: 23)?

BRIEF NOTES

Dr. G. W. Field, of Bangor, Me., who died recently at the age of eighty-five years, left this behind as his dying testimony: "I have trusted God for my life; I am willing to trust him for eternity, not for myself only, but for the universe."

A good example to wealthy men is set by a New England deacon who has left to his church a legacy which, when invested will produce an income equivalent to his subscription to the church funds. The church consequently will not lose financially by his death.

The statement credited to a Y. M. C. A. secretary that there is an unseemly and disastrous rivalry among the denominations in Porto Rico, is unauthorized. The secretary in question emphatically denies ever making such a statement and brands it as false.

Any of our readers knowing a blind person who is in need of a Scripture volume, can obtain one free, on the payment of the cost of expressage, by writing to Wm. E. Geer, New York Bible Society, 66 Bible House, New York. The volumes are in raised letters, line print.

Dr. L. W. Munhall has conducted a very successful mission at Johnstown, N. Y. The meetings for men only and for women only have been largely attended. At one great meeting in the Grand Opera House, sixty men of various ages rose and pledged themselves in Christ's strength to a new life.

An excellent work for the use of Presidents of Young People's Societies, which will furnish them with facts for missionary talks, has been issued, price 25 cents, by the Student Volunteer Movement. It is entitled "Modern Apostles of Missionary Byways." Address, Harlan P. Beach, 3 West Twenty-ninth street, New York.

An interesting revival has taken place at Springfield, Mo., under the preaching of Major J. H. Cole. Baptist, Christian, Methodist and Presbyterian churches united in the movement. Meetings were held in the churches of each denomination and in the railroad shops at the noon hour. All the churches are gaining accessions of membership.

Evangelist E. P. Telford has been holding meetings in Boston, Mass., during the past two weeks. Bromfield Street M. E. Church was crowded night after night and the number of inquirers continually increased. Mr. Telford has a number of invitations from other New England churches which he hopes to fill during the next two months.

A great farewell meeting was held recently in the Victoria Hall, Adelaide, South Australia, to bid good-by to Rev. C. H. Yatman, whose work in Brisbane, Sydney, Melbourne, Newcastle and other cities has resulted in arousing more than four thousand inquirers. Many eminent speakers joined with officers of the Y. M. C. A. in a hearty tribute of thanksgiving.

There is grave anxiety for the safety of American missionaries in the province of Shang Tung, China. Our minister at Pekin has called the attention of the Chinese government to the anti-foreign agitation prevalent in the province, and the Empress has sent strict orders to the governor to protect the missionaries; but the force at his command is not sufficient to awe the rioters, who are menacing the mission.

On the Ocean Highway

AND the days follered one another long in Injin file, trampin' silently and stiddily on, no matter where we be or what we do. So we sailed on and on, the ship dashin' along at I don't know how many knots an hour. Probably the knots would be enough if straightened out to make a hull bank of yarn, and mebby more. Part of the time the waves dashin' high. Mebby the Pacific waves are a little less tumultous and high sweepin' than the Atlantic, a little more pacific as it were, but they sway out dretful long, and dash up dretful high, bearin' us along with 'em every time, up and down, down and up, and part of the time our furniture and our stomachs would foller 'em and sway, too, and act. The wind would soar along, chasin' after us, but never quite ketchin' us; sometimes abaft, sometimes in the fo'castle, whatever that may be.

THE STEWARD

And under us wuz the great silent graveyard, the solemn, green aisles, still and quiet, and no knowin' how soon we should be there, too, surrounded by the riches of that lost world of them that go down in ships, but not doin' us any good. Only a board or two and some paint between us and destruction (but then I don't know as we are seperated any time very fur from danger, earthquakes, tornados and such). And good land! I would tell myself and Josiah, for that matter I've known wimmen to fall right out of their chairs and break themselves all up more or less, and fall offen back steps and suller stairs and such. But 'tennyrate I felt real riz up as I looked off on the heavin billers, and Faith sez to me, "Why should I fear since I sailed with God. The seas, I am journeying, I told myself with Duty on one side of me and on the other side Josiah, and the sun of Love over all. I got along without any seasickness to speak of, but my pardner suffered ontold agonies—or no, they wuzn't ontold, he told 'em all to me—yes, indeed!

Society on Shipboard

Tommy "wonnered" what made the big vessel sail on so fast, and what made so much water, where it all come from, and where it wuz all goin' to. And at night he would lay on his little shelf and "wonner" what the wind wuz sayin'; one night he spoke out kinder in rhyme, sez he: "Grandma, do you know what the wind is saying?" And I sez:

"No, dear lamb; what is it sayin'?" It had sounded dretful, kinder wild and skairful to me, and so it had to Josiah, I knew by the sithes he had gin. Sez Tommy, it sez:

"Don't be afraid my little child,
God will take care of you all the while."

And I sez, "Thank you, Tommy, you've done me good." And I noticed that Josiah seemed more contented and dropped off to sleep real sweet, though he snored some. Sometimes Tommy would "wonner" what sea-sickness wuz like, if it wuz any like measles, but didn't find out, for he wuzn't sick a day, but wandered about the great ship, happy as a king, making friends everywhere, though Robert Strong remained his chief friend and helper. Dorothy wuz more beautiful than ever it seemed to me, a shadow of paleness over her sweet face peeping out from the white fur of her cunning little pink hood, makin' her look sweeter than ever. There wuz two or three handsome young men on board who appreciated her beauty, and I spoze the gold setting of her charming youth. But Miss Meechim called on Robert Strong to help protect her, which he did willingly enough, so fur as I could see, by payin' the most devoted attention to her himself, supplying every real or fancied want, reading to and with her, and walking up and down the deck with her, she leanin' on his arm in slippery times.

"THERE WUZ THE USUAL VARIETY OF PEOPLE ON BOARD"

"Dear boy!" says Miss Meechim, "how lovely he is to me. He would much rather spend his time with the men in the smoking and reading room, but he has always been just so; let me express a wish and he flies to execute it. He knows that I wouldn't have Dorothy marry for all the world, and had it not been for his invaluable help I fear that she would have fallen a prey to some man before this."

"She is a pretty girl," sez I, "pretty as a pink rosy."

"Yes," sez she, "she is a sweet girl and as good as she is beautiful."

There was the usual variety of people on the ship. The rich family travelin' with children and servants and unlimited baggage; the party of school girls with the slim talkative teacher in spectacles, tellin' 'em all the pints of interest, and stuffin' 'em with knowledge gradual but constant; the stiddy goin' business men and the fashionable ones; the married flirt and the newly married bride and husband, sheepish lookin' but happy; old wimmen and young ones; young men and old ones; the sick passenger confined to his bed, but devourin' more food than any two well ones—seven meals a day have I seen carried into that room by the steward, while a voice weak but onwaverin' would call for more. There wuz a opera singer, a evangelist, an English nobleman, and a party of colored singers who made the night beautiful sometimes with their weird pathetic melodies.

Interesting Passengers

There wuz two missionaries on board, one the Rev. Dr. Wessel, real dignified actin' and lookin'—he wuz goin' out as a missionary to China, and a young lady going out as a missionary to Africa, Evangeline Noble—she wuz a member of some kind of a sisterhood, so she wuz called Sister Evangeline. I sot a sight of store by her the first time I laid eyes on her. Anybody could see that she wuz one of the Lord's anointed, and like our cousin John Richard, who went out as a missionary to Africa several years ago, she only wanted the Lord's will pinted out to her to foller it to the death if necessary. Livin' so nigh to the Kingdom as she did she couldn't help its breezes fannin' her tired forehead occasionally, and the angel's songs and the sound of the still waters from reachin' her soul. She had left a luxurious home, all her loved ones, a host of friends, and wuz goin' out to face certain hardships, and probable sickness and death amongst a strange half savage people, and yet she had about the happiest face I ever saw. His peace wuz writ down on her brow. Her Lord journeyed with her and told her from day to day what he wanted her to do. After we got well acquainted she told me that ever since her conversion there were times when she became uncon scious to things on earth, but her soul seemed to be ketched up to some other realm, where He, who wuz her constant helper and guide, told her what to do. I told Josiah about it, and he sez:

"I'd ruther see that than hear on't. How can she be ketched up, weighin' pretty nigh two hundred?"

Sez I, "Your views are material, Josiah. I said her soul wuz ketched up."

"O well, my soul and body has ginerally gone together where I've went."

"I don't doubt that," sez I, "not at all. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned."

"Well," sez he, "I've hearn a sight about such things as that, but I'd ruther see 'em myself."

Well, it wuzn't but a day or two after that that he had a chance to see if he had eyes. Sister Evangeline wuz settin' with Josiah and me on the deck, and all of a sudden while she wuz talkin' to us about her future life and work in Africa, her face took on a look as yourn would if your attention had been suddenly arrested by a voice calling you. She looked off over the water as if it wuzn't there, and I felt that someone wuz talkin' to her we couldn't see—her face had jest that look, and at last I hearn her murmur in a low voice:

"Yes, Master, I will go."

And most immegiately her soul seemed to come back from somewhere, and she sez to me:

"I am told that there is a poor woman amongst the steerage passengers that needs me." And she riz right up and started, like Paul, not disobedient to the Heavenly vision, not for a minute. She told me afterwards that she found a woman with a newly-born child almost dying for want of help. She was alone and friendless, and if Sister Evangeline hadn't reached her just as she did they would both have died. She wuz a trained nurse, and saved both their lives, and she wuz as good as she could be to 'em till we reached port, where the woman's husband wuz to meet her.

Josiah acted stunted when I told him, but sez weakly, "I believe she hearn the woman holler."

And I sez, "She wuz fainted away, how could she holler?"

And he sez, "It must be a heavy faint that will keep a woman from talkin'."

Elder Wessel and Lucia

The other missionary, Elder Wessel, I didn't set quite so much store by. His only child Lucia wuz on board going out to China with a rich tea merchant's family as a governess for their little daughter, and some one told me that one reason that Elder Wessel hearn such a loud call to go as a missionary to China was because Lucia wuz goin' there.

Now, there wuz a young chap over in Loontown who had tried doctorin' for a year or two and didn't make much by it, and he thought he see a sign up in the heavens, G. P., and he gin out that he had had a call "go preach," and went to preachin', and he didn't make so well hat as he did by his doctorin', and then e gin out that he had made a mistake in adin' the letters; instead of goin' to reach they meant "give pills," so he ent back to his doctorin' agin' and is bin' first rate. That wuzn't a call.

But to resoom. Elder Wessel jest worhiped this daughter, and thought she uz the sweetest, dearest girl in the orld. And she wuz a pretty girl with bft. bright innocent eyes. She wuz eduated in a convent, and had the sweet, entle manners and onworldly look that many convent-bred girls have. She nd Aronette struck up a warm friendhip, though her pa wouldn't have allowed I spoze if he hadn't seen how much ore we all sot by Aronette.

We got real well acquainted with Elder Vessel and Lucia; and her proud pa wuz ever tired of singin' her praises or ruther antin' em—he wuz too dignified to sing. rvilly loved to talk with him, though eir idees wuz about as congenial as ile nd water. He wuz real mild and conservave, always drinked moderate and always ad wine on his table, and approved of e canteen and saloon, which he extolled s the Poor Man's Club. He thought at the government wuz jest right, the ig trusts and license laws jest as they ould be, and the wars with the Philipines and Cuba the most holy wars of all me.

Arvilly dearly loved to send sharp rrows of sarkasm and argument through is coat armor of dignified complacency nd self-esteem, for truly his idees wuz to er like a red rag to a bull.

A Strange Partnership

Miss Meechim kinder looked down on rvilly, and I guess Arvilly looked down n her. You know it happens so some mes—two folks will feel real above each ther, though it stands to reason that one f 'em must be mistook. Miss leechim thought she wuz more genel than Arvilly, and was worth more nd I guess she had had better adantages. And Arvilly thought she new more than Miss Meechim, and guess mebby she did. Miss Meechn thought she wuz jest right herelf, she thought her native land uz jest right and all its laws and ustoms, and naterally she looked own dretfully on all foreigners. he and Arvilly had lots of little pats about matters and things, ough Miss Meechim wuz so genel that she kep' her dignity most f the time, though Arvilly gin it evere raps anon or oftener.

But one tie seemed to unite 'em a ttle—they wuz real congenial on he subject of man. They both seemd to cherish an inherient aversion o that sect of which my pardner s an ornament, and had a strong ettled dislike to matrimony; broken nce by Arvilly, as a sailor may break is habit of sea-faring life by livin' n shore a spell, but still keepin' up is love for the sea.

But of their talks together and Arvilly's arguments with Elder Wesel more anon and bime by. Arvilly tood up aginst the sea-sickness as he would aginst a obstinate subcriber, and finally brought the sickess to terms as she would the buyer, n the third day, and appeared pale but riumphant, with a subscription book in er hand and the words of her prospectus dribblin' from her lips. She had ordered trunkful to sell on sight, but Arvilly vill never git over what she has went hrough, never.

As the days went on the big ship seemed nore and more to us like a world, or uther a new sort of a planet we wuz inabitin'—it kinder seemed to be the cener of the universe. I overheard a woman ay one day how monotonous the life vuz. But I thought to myself, mebby er mind wuz kinder monotonous—some e, you know, made so in the first on't; I ound plenty enough to interest me, and o Josiah did.

There wuz a big library where you could keep company with the great minds f the past and present. A music room where most always some of the best nusic wuz to be hearn, for of course here wuz lots of musicians on board, here always is. And for them that wanted it, there wuz a smokin' room, though Josiah or I didn't have any use for it, never havin' smoked anything but a little mullen and catnip once or twice for tizik. And there wuz a billiard room for them that patronized Bill, though I never did nor Josiah, but wuz willin' that folks should act out their own naters. I spoze they played cards there, too. But Josiah and I didn't know one card from another; I couldn't tell Jack from the King to save my life.

Josiah as an Entertainer

We stayed in the music room quite a good deal and once or twice Josiah expressed the wish that he had brought along his accordeon.

And he sez: "It don't seem right to take all this pleasure and not give back anything in return."

But I sez, "I guess they'll git along without hearin' that accordeon."

"I might sing sunthin', I spoze," sez he, "I could put on my dressin' gown and belt it down with the tossels and appear as a singer, and sing a silo."

That wuz the evenin' after Dorothy, in a thin, white dress, a little low in the neck and short sleeves, had stood up and sung a lovely piece, or that is I 'spoze it wuz lovely, it wuz in some foreign tongue, but it sounded first rate, as sweet as the song of a robin or medder lark—you know how we all like to hear them, though we can't quite understand robin and lark language. It wuz kinder good in Josiah to want to give pleasure in return for what he had had, but I argyed him into thinkin' that he and I would give more pleasure as a congregation than as speakers or singers. For after I had vetoed the singin' that good man proposed that he should speak a piece. Sez he, "I could tell most the hull of the American Taxation."

And I sez, "I wouldn't harrer up the minds of the rich men on board with thoughts of taxes," sez I, "when lots of 'em are goin' away to get rid on 'em."

"Well," sez he, "I could tell the hull of Robert Kidd."

And I sez, "Well, I wouldn't harrer up their feelin's talkin' about hullsale stealin'; they have enough of that to hum in the big cities."

So gradual I got him off from the idee.

There wuz one little boy about Tommy's age and a sister a little older I felt real sorry for, they looked so queer, and their ma, a thin, wirey, nervous lookin' woman brooded over 'em like a settin' hen over her eggs. They wuz dressed well, but dretful bulged out and swollen lookin', and I sez to their ma one day:

"Are your children dropsical?"

And she sez, "Oh no, their health is good. The swellin's you see are life preservers." She said that she kep' one on their stomachs night and day.

Well, I knew that they would be handy in a shipwreck, but it made 'em look queer, queer as a dog.

And now whilst the passengers are all settin' or standin' on their own forts and tendin' to their own bizness, and the big ship ploughin' its big liquid furrow on the water I may as well tell what Arvilly went through. I spoze the reader is anxious to know the petickulers of how she come to be in the Cuban army and desert from it. The reason of her bein' in the army at all, her husband enlisted durin' the late struggle for Cuban independence, and Arvilly jest worshipin' the ground he walked on, and thinkin' the world wuz a blank to her where he wuz not, after the last care he left her wuz removed, and always havin' done as she wuz a mind to as fur as she could, she dressed herself up in a suit of his clothes and enlisted onbeknown to him, so's to be near to him if he got woonded, and 'tennyrate to breathe the same air he did and sleep under the same stars. She adored him.

DOROTHY AND ROBERT

It must be remembered that Arvilly had never loved a single thing till she fell in love with this man, her folks dyin' off and leavin' her to come up the best she could, and imposed upon and looked down upon on every side, and workin' hard for a livin', and after she got old enough to read and understand, bein' intellect and practical good sense and household knowledge as a welcome relief from incompetence in hired girl form in the kitchen. His first wife died when his little girl wuz born, and she wuz about seven when Arvilly married her pa. Well, he bein' jest what he wuz—conscientious, God-fearin' 'and havin hearn his minister preach powerful sermons on this bein' a war of God aginst the Devil, enlightenment and Christianity aginst ignorance and barbarism, America aginst Spain—he got all fired up with the sense of what wuz his duty to do, and when his mind wuz made up to that no man or woman could turn him. Arvilly might have just as well spent her tears and entreaties on her soapstun. No, go he must and go he would. But like the good man he wuz, he made everything just as comfortable as he could for her and his little daughter, a pretty creeter that Arvilly too loved dearly. And then he bid 'em a sad adoo, for he loved 'em well, and Arvilly had made his home a comfortable and happy one. But he choked back his tears, tried to smile on 'em with his tremblin' lips, held 'em both long in his strong arms, oncloseed 'em, and they wuz bereft. Well, Arvilly held the weeping little girl in her arms, bent over her with white face and dry eyes, for his sake endured the long days and longer nights alone with the child, for his sake taking good care of her, wondering at the blow that had fell upon her, wondering that if in the future she could be so blest agin as to have a home, for love is the soul of the home and she felt homeless.

Well, she watched and worked, takin' good care of the little one, but bolts and bars can't keep out death; Arvilly's arms, though she wuz strong boneded, couldn't. Diphtheria wuz round, little Annie took it; in one week Arvilly wuz indeed alone, and when the sod lay between her and what little likeness of her husband had shone through the child's pretty face, Arvilly formed a strange resolution, but not so strange but what wimmen have formed it heretofore, and probably will agin' till God's truth shall shine on a dark world and be listened to, and wars shall be no more. She made up her mind to follei the man she loved, she made up her mind to enlist. She wuz always a masculine lookin' creeter, Arvilly wuz, big, raw boneded, and when she cut off her hair and parted it on one side in a man's way and put on a suit of her husband's clothes she looked as much, or more like a man than she had ever looked like a woman. She locked the doors of her home till the cruel war should be ended, and he whose love made her home, should return. Till then, if indeed it should ever be, she left her happiness there in the empty, silent rooms and sallied off. She had disposed of her stock and things like that, folks not bein' surprised at it, bein' she wuz alone, but all to once she disappeared, utterly and entirely, nobody hearn of her and folks thought that mebby she had wandered off in her grief and put an end to her life. Not one word wuz hearn of her until lo and behold! the strange news come, Arvilly's husband wuz killed in a drunken brawl in a licensed Canteen down in Cuba and Arvilly had deserted from the army, and of course bein' a woman they couldn't touch her for it. That wuz the first we ever knowed that she wuz in the army. Blowin' up the Maine wuz nothin' to the excitement when we hearn on it.

"DOROTHY, IN A THIN, WHITE DRESS, SUNG A LOVELY PIECE"

The Story of Arvilly

Her husband wuz a good man, not the smartest in the world, but a good, honest God fearin' man, who had had a hard time to get along, but always tried to do jest right, and who hailed Arvilly's bright smart as a whip and one of the firmest lovers of justice and fair play that ever wuz born, she become such a firm believer in wimmen's rights that she got enemies that way. Well, you know right when she started for the World's Fair, helpin' herself along by sellin' the book, The Wild, Wicked, and Warlike Deeds of Men (which she said she felt wuz her duty to promulgate to wimmen to keep 'em from marryin' and makin' fools of themselves). Well right there some like Paul on his way to Jerusalem, breathin' vengeance against his Lord, a great light struck him down in the road, so with Arvilly, the great light of Love stopped her in her career, she dropped her book, married the man she loved and who loved her, and lived happy as a queen till the Cuban war broke out.

The Women of Egypt

A BEAUTY OF CAIRO

EGYPT, that ancient land of mystery and charm, the cradle of learning, the land of the Sphinx and the Pyramids, possesses great fascination for the modern traveler, and still, as of old, beckons and holds the attention of the stay-at-home reader. Photography shows us to-day, with unerring fidelity, just how the people and the homes of other countries look, so that even if we never visit them in person we may have a familiar acquaintance with them, and recognize each type when we meet it. Fashion in Oriental countries is not the fickle goddess which she is with us, and as women dressed in Cleopatra's day, or in the days when Joseph married Asenath, daughter of the priestly house of On, so the women array themselves to-day. An Oriental lady prizes her jewels highly, and her taste leads her to adorn her dark beauty with strings of pearls, rubies and emeralds. So that when in full dress she fairly scintillates and blazes with barbaric magnificence. Her vestments are embroidered with seed pearls and golden thread. Her raiment is glittering and all, as the Bible says, needlewrought. From her dark hair, a veil caught on the top of her head, falls back on either side, like a mantle, and when she walks abroad she veils her face, leaving only a place for her lustrous eyes to peep forth and see the world which may not see her. When not arrayed in her best, or when not possessed of great wealth, the Egyptian woman displays fewer gems in her toilette, but she always adorns her rounded arms with costly bracelets, and sometimes not only her ears, but her nose form nooks from which to hang heavy and cumbersome rings.

The home life of the most beautiful Egyptian woman is a travesty on what we expect of our homes; for the religion of Egypt is Mohammedan, and in the Moslem's view woman is always "an inferior, dependent creature, destined only for the service of her master." Islam does not understand the elevation of woman. In the harem, jealously, envy, and greed fill the idle days; plurality of wives means bitterness and wrath, and it is no wonder that a Mohammedan woman, speaking to Mr. Robert Speer, said with concentrated sadness, "Your prophet did well for your women. I shall have words with our prophet when I meet him in the next world."

A recent visitor to Cairo speaks of the journey there, through the land of Goshen, a lovely country, flat and well-tilled, with rice and cotton springing up, cattle and sheep in abundance. This recalls the story of Joseph and his brethren in Genesis. From Cairo one goes on an afternoon excursion or for a moonlight evening, to the hoary pyramids, or strolling through the quaint streets, may see people from every country of the globe, and find history laid out in spectacular panorama before his eyes. Silk tapestry, brass trays, cups, embroideries, picture frames, rugs, all sorts of curios are bargained for in the bazaars, the merchants on principle asking a larger amount than he expects to receive for his wares. Yet after all, the most lasting thing one brings home from an Egyptian sojourn are the intangible ones: the memories of dusky yet beautiful women, veiled, mysterious and elusive, with childish questionings in their soft, dark eyes.

A GROUP OF WOMEN OF CAIRO, EGYPT

"Christian Living"

In a very helpful little book bearing this title, Rev. F. B. Meyer, talking with disciples of their privileges, gives some suggestive thoughts. I was reading the chapter from which I cull a few words for you, dear friends, only this morning on which I write, and I was so pleased and brightened by a bit of counsel, that I said, "There, I shall copy that for my circle of readers under our evening lamp." "A little group of earnest men were gathered not long ago around a fire, eagerly discussing the methods of a holy life and reciting their own experiences of the grace of God. One had recently entered upon the gladness of a life of entire consecration and spoke fervently of his new found joys. But when his story was told, a venerable clergyman expressed his disappointment at an experience which was only negative and told so little of the positive side of the appropriation of Christ.

"Years before, when engaged in a gathering of unruly and noisy children, he had been suddenly driven to claim from the Saviour the gift of His own gentle patience in the words, 'Thy patience, Lord!' And instantly so divine a calm filled his spirit that he realized he had made a great discovery, and from that moment he had retained the extremes of his brief petition, inserting between them the grace, the lack of which was hurrying him to sin. In moments of weakness, 'Thy strength, Lord!' or in moments of conscious strength, 'Thy humility, Lord!' When assailed by unholy suggestions, 'Thy purity, Lord!' or when passing through deep waters of trial, 'Thy resignation and restfulness, Lord!' What is this but a living example of the appropriation of Christ? This thought would light up the darkest, saddest life. We sadly chide ourselves for our failures, and yet we are oppressed by the weary consciousness that we are all too likely to repeat them. We catch glimpses of ideals in the lives of others, and in our own happier moments that only mock us. We fail to adorn the gospel of God our Saviour in all things, because we lack the materials for the beautiful garments of our array. And all this because we do not realize that all of Jesus is for us; only waiting for us to appropriate it with exceeding joy."

A Matter of Taste

That people should ever stop to quarrel among themselves at home is very sad. It would seem that grown people should know better than to exchange passionate upbraidings and scornful words, knowing how little good these family jars can do and how much harm must come of them. Human nature being what it is, and, unrestrained by the grace of God, being so pitiably weak, I fear we may always expect some scolding, some nagging, some cross looks and vexing words to be existent on occasion somewhere or other. But, good friend, if you quarrel, get the thing over at once. Don't pout and sulk and look injured and go about looking gloomy and black. Don't refuse to acknowledge that you have been in the wrong. Don't hesitate to accept an apology from the one who is sorry first. And, whatever you do, refrain from disputes in the presence of outsiders. Nothing is more embarrassing than to be forced to remain a witness to some disagreeable family passage at arms, unable to do anything but blush and wish one's self a thousand miles from the scene. Nothing is less excusable than rudeness shown by husband to wife, or by wife to husband, or by children to one another in the company of guests or in public.

There is an old Bible word—the word froward, which just hits off the peculiarities of some people—Christian people, too. Dear friends, do not let us be froward. And, if ever we are so, let us keep out of sight till we get over it.

One Use of Sickness

"I never understood before," said a mother whose idolized daughter is recovering slowly from a prolonged illness, "what it is to have a visitation of anxiety and care, such as a lingering illness brings with it; a campaign of fighting against a stubborn enemy. I shall be more sympathetic all the rest of my life with those who have similar trouble." That is one use of sorrow and of sickness, is it not, to make us compassionate?

The Dear Little Wife at Home

THE dear little wife at home, John,
With ever so much to do,
Stitches to set and babies to pet,
And so many thoughts of you.
The beautiful household fairy
Filling your heart with light,
Whatever you meet to-day, John,
Go cheerily home to-night.

For though you are ever so weary,
You need not be cross or curt,
There are words like darts to gentle hearts,
There are looks that wound and hurt.
With the key in the latch at home, John,
Drop troubles out of sight.
To the dear little wife who is waiting,
Go cheerily home to-night.

You know she will come to meet you,
A smile on her sunny face;
And your wee little girl as pure as a pearl
Will be there in her childish grace.
And the boy—his father's pride—John,
With eyes so brave and bright;
From the strife and the din to the peace,
With eyes so brave and bright;
From the strife and the din, to the peace, John,
Go cheerily home to-night.

What, though the tempest try you,
Though the shafts of adverse fate
May hurtle near, and the sky be drear
And the laggard fortune wait;
You are passing rich already,
Let the haunting fears take flight
With the faith that wins success, John,
Go cheerily home to-night.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—JOHN. A girl worth winning does not readily yield. It is her right to be candid. If you cannot give up smoking at her request, I am afraid you like a cigar better than you love the young woman you desire to marry.

—SUSAN JANE. Why be so rigid? Your husband is engaged all the week and never sees his children awake. Why not let them sit up until nine o'clock on Sunday evening, if he desires it? Aunt Prudence is afraid you are a little overfond of carrying your point.

—YOUNG CHESTERFIELD. If your mother is an invalid, take your fiancee to call on her. If your mother is an active person in good health, she will call on your fiancee. These matters are regulated by common sense, as well as by arbitrary rules.

—META. Gladys, Dorothy, Margaret, and Katherine are just now favorite names for girls. Harold, Roderick, Max, Edward, Cecil and Dudley are good names for boys. But I should call my twins, if I were you, after my own father and mother, even if their names are plain John and Jane.

—INQUIRING FRIEND. Aunt Patience does not approve of imitation jewelry. As a rule, wear real stones or none. Hat pins are admissible with imitation stones, or are less objectionable than rings or brooches. But if you are buying a hat pin, select a silver or gold pin instead of a jeweled one.

—BONNY JEAN. Superfluous hair on the face would better be borne with. A sallow complexion may be cured by abjuring too highly-spiced and greasy food, and strong coffee. Bathe and exercise freely. Pray avoid cosmetics; or if you use them do so sparingly. A good cold cream, or a lotion of glycerine and rosewater is harmless, and often is beneficial.

—J. C. D. The little lad who runs away must be tied to the bedpost with a soft bandage for a little while, or else have a cord put around his waist, giving him a good long tether, however, so that he can move freely. I think he does not understand yet that he must not wander off. Perhaps his mother has been very busy and has not given him attention or provided amusements for him. Has he no playmates?

—JESSIE. By no means give your picture to a young man before he asks for it. Let him ask several times and then be very sure that you wish him to have it. Do not ask for his. Of what use can it be to you, unless you are specially dear friends? It is your privilege to begin a correspondence with a stay-at-home friend of either sex, if you are yourself away on a visit. A man who knows you well may certainly write to you, if he is absent; you may use your judgment as to replying. Never exchange cards with casual acquaintances who are not properly introduced. The oldest daughter in the family is Miss Smith, and has "Miss" engraved on her visiting card; the others are Miss Mary, Miss Jane, or Miss Jemima Smith, as may be. The addition of your residence is a matter of choice or convenience. In a small town, it is unnecessary, as everybody knows where everybody lives.

India's Dying People

Official Reports from the Viceroy Confirm the Statements of Missionaries as to the Unprecedented Severity of the Famine

A CABLE despatch from Calcutta, dated January 10, states that the Viceroy and the Imperial Council held a special meeting on that day to take into consideration the famine situation. The official estimates show that the awful scarcity now affects about twenty-two million persons in British territory, and twenty-seven millions in the native States. The Viceroy, Lord Curzon of Kedleston, said the famine area had expanded.

Surpassing the Worst Fears, and they were now facing a cattle, water, and food scarcity of a terrible character. About 3,250,000 persons, he continued, were already receiving relief. While in 1897, the world shared India's sorrow and contributed hundreds of thousands of pounds toward the relief fund, the Viceroy pointed out, India now would have to struggle alone, for the thoughts of every Englishman in the world were centred on South Africa.

The dispatch continues: "The outside world can have but a faint idea of the disastrous effect of the condition of things so coldly described in the official statement given, but the following extract from the letter of a Bombay official dated from Ahmedabad, affords some slight indication of it. He says: "I came here on tour, and find there is every evidence of famine, but the wholesale mortality of cattle is the most striking feature at present. I am afraid this will be the worst famine the Bombay Presidency and India generally has had for very many years past, the area is so extensive and the failure of grass and crops so absolute; in addition to which the water supply is failing. In this usually fertile province of Guzerat-Rajputana and Kattiwar, they have had no such visitation within the century, and in the Deccan, alas! this is the second acute famine in three years. I went to the poorhouse here, which has only been started a short time, for people who are picked up about the city precincts too weak to work and exhausted from nothing to eat. There are already two hundred and twenty in the house little better than living skeletons. Some die every day in the poorhouse. It is only the beginning of what will get worse, more acute, every month for at least six months to come. There is not the slightest doubt that were the British Government not here now, whole provinces would get depopulated; and with all the resources at our command the Government is scarcely able to stand the drain on its resources.'

In a letter just received from Rev. J. E. Scott, the Presiding Elder of the Agra District, he says: "I have just returned from an extended tour throughout the famine-stricken land of Rajputana (which this year is a part of my district), and feel that you ought to know the condition of our Church in that part of southern Asia. We have there more than two thousand native Christians, the most of whom are poor at the best of times, but now are starving to death. It has not rained much for three years, and the land has produced nothing. There are now here twelve million people, who must depend upon imported grain, largely from the Northwest provinces, which themselves are in distress. The prospects for any improvement in the near future are gloomy. In some places parents have sold their children, and there are rumors of more horrible things.

"There is no work to be obtained in the fields, as it is useless for the farmers to plough and sow. The native States are doing something to relieve this distress, and the imperial government is helping, and many are thus rescued; but there are thousands who will not be thus reached. Over two thousand poor Christians look to us for help, and there are many cases where immediate help is needed for non-Christians, while it is pitiful to see the pinched faces, emaciated forms, and hear the feeble cry of little children. Our missionaries in Ajmir are ready to do all they can to help in this time of need, and have done much, but their hands are empty." Mr. Scott adds that even at the increased price of food it is possible to keep a native alive at the rate of five cents a day.

Rev. Thomas M. Hudson, of Ahmedabad, writes that "A peculiar feature of this famine is the startling rapidity with which the acute stage has been reached. Yesterday, comparative plenty. To-day, destroying famine! There has been no famine in Gujarat for nearly a century. Hence, every one has confidently expected rain to fall in time to save the crops, and precautions were not taken in time. Government was taken by surprise with the rest, and had no relief work schemes fully planned in advance; although now making strenuous efforts to cope with the situation.

"The Christian community of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Gujarat is well on toward six thousand souls. Almost all of them are from the classes first to suffer. Already many of them have begun to travel the terrible road of slow starvation by reason of their daily food being increasingly insufficient to sustain life. What their sufferings will be in another month unless promptly succored, I have not the heart to contemplate.

"After thoroughly investigating their respective charges the missionaries of this church in Gujarat District, carefully canvassed the situation, decided that the appeals already sent to America should be supplemented by a cable urging immediate help, and also by a general appeal to the Christian public."

Mrs. Holcomb, of the Presbyterian mission at Jhansi, writes that her husband, who helped to distribute the relief sent by the readers of this journal three years ago, is giving all the relief to the starving people that he has been able to obtain, but it is very little among so many. He is planning to give work to weavers and men of other trades who now have no employment, but money is sorely needed to carry on such operations.

From missionaries of all denominations come similar urgent appeals. They plead that if no more help can be sent, that at least they may have money with which to relieve mothers and children whose cries for food are heart-rending. Only one dollar would enable them to give a meal to twenty. The missionaries beg for this and surely they will not ask in vain. There is no Christian heart that will not respond to a plea based on the tears and agony of a child, or of a mother who cannot endure the sight of her offspring pining to death. Contributions sent to this office will be acknowledged in these columns and will be forwarded by the speediest method to India, where they will be distributed by the missionaries, under the superintendence of the Inter-denominational Committee, organized in 1897. The list of contributions already received is crowded out this week, but will be published in an early issue.

Can Eat Any Kind of Food

Since she Left off Coffee and Uses Postum Food Coffee

"Coffee caused dull headaches and dizziness, with steady indigestion, until I discovered the reason of the trouble, and this was proven by leaving off coffee and taking Postum Food Coffee. The dizziness, headache and indigestion have entirely disappeared.

"My mother, Mrs. Burlingame, Kenilworth, O., was a great sufferer from stomach trouble and indigestion for many years. She had to live on a very restricted diet, until during the past winter she gave up coffee and began using Postum Food Coffee every day. It is now three months since she made the change, and she is so much improved she can eat nearly any kind of food. It is evidence to us that the coffee caused the trouble and that the Postum Food Coffee helped to build her back into health and strength." Mrs. J. M. Gould, W. Farmington, O.

For every one there is money enough to buy that to eat which is pure, sound, good, wholesome.

Why should we use cheap, impure, unhealthful articles of food? There is no economy in them; they endanger the health, they may cost life. There are reported almost daily cases of sickness caused be eating cake, puddings or biscuit made with the cheap, alum baking powders.

In all articles of food buy and use only the best, The good health of the family is of first consideration.

Alum is used in baking powders because it is cheap, costing less than two cents a pound. It is a corrosive poison. Think of feeding it to children! Yet the manufacturers of well-known alum powders are actually denying that they contain alum.

THE TOUCHSTONE

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

CHAPTER XIV.

A Mysterious Question

WAITING anxiously for the result of his appeal to his brother, Douglas sat perfectly still and added no word further. He had come to give Caryl his opportunity. He had come in good faith, sincerely doing his best for the Hamertons, but if Caryl refused to help them, Douglas would not be sorry. No young man could be expected to grieve if his wealthy rival failed to make use of his advantage. Honor compelled Douglas to do what he had done, but it did not require him to do more. He was prepared to hear Caryl consent: he would not be surprised to hear him refuse; but no words could express his astonishment at the reply which at last Caryl made. Looking keenly in Douglas' eyes Caryl said:

"Why don't you help the Hamertons yourself?"

"It becomes you to ask that question!" said Douglas, after a moment, with the intense quietness of wrath that is beyond words; "you, who know that I have nothing but the bare living that I work for, and who know so well why. You know as well as I do that never in my life have I had a quarter of that sum at one time. Heaven knows, if I could raise it now, or even half of it, I should not be telling you this story. But let us leave me and my affairs alone. We must quarrel sooner or later, I suppose, but I would rather not do it just now, even if it were not for this other business. What do you mean to do about that?"

Caryl had dropped his hands, and was listening with a frown that seemed to be half of pain and half of strenuous effort to understand.

"Yes—the Hamertons," he said slowly, "let us settle that first. There's no time to be lost, I think you said? After that, there is something else that I must get to the bottom of——"

The door was flung open, and the landlord's voice, with a roll of satisfaction, announced:

"Mr. Cribb, Mr. Lawson, and Captain Sandford, by appointment."

Both brothers rose, Caryl leaning for an instant on the end of the sofa and putting his hand to his forehead, and Douglas drawing back, his heart sinking in mingled wrath and despair at the interruption.

"I believe I had forgotten—I beg your pardon, gentlemen," said Caryl, rather vaguely. "Mr. Wilson, will you be good enough to light the gas? Good evening, Mr. Lawson."

He shook hands with his inopportune visitors, and signed to Wilson, the landlord, to find chairs for them; and from the third he turned to Douglas and spoke to him in an undertone:

"I will consider the matter you were speaking of," he said briefly; and if the words did not commit him to anything, neither did the look of his pale face, with the dark shadows under eyes that seemed too weary and oppressed to face the light.

"He puts me off with generalities, as he does his constituents," thought Douglas bitterly as he went down the stairs. I'm afraid they don't inspire me with the confidence that others seem to feel!"

No, it was not confidence, but neither was it doubt—only absolute uncertainty. Douglas had believed that after his talk with his brother he should know at any rate what to think of him, which was a thing that he had not known for these many months past. The Touchstone would at least have done him that good office. But he knew no more than before—thanks, perhaps, to the political deputation.

Douglas went wearily to his work, feeling but little interest in it while his suspense continued. He did it as best he could and then went to his room intending to go to bed at once and try to get some sleep. As he entered the house, Mrs. Tomlinson called to him from her kitchen, just as she had done on that May evening when he had first met Celia Hamerton.

"There's a letter for you in yonder, Mr. Lingard. Came this afternoon."

Douglas hurried forward into the room, caught up the letter, and tore it open without waiting to scrutinize the outside of it, confident that it was from Martin, and would end his suspense one way or the other.

The first enclosure that met his eye was the familiar paper of a telegraph form, on which, in the customary scrawl, was written:

"Father not worse, but will be if we cannot pacify him. Come at once if you possibly can. Frank."

Perplexed, Douglas stared at this missive, wondering why it should have been sent to him, and above all, why it should arrive in such a manner. Then he felt again in the envelope to see if it might contain something in the nature of an explanation. This time he drew out a half-sheet of paper, on which was written in Mrs. Locke's hand:

"I send you this, which has just reached me. I suppose you will have to go; but it is a pity it should happen just now.

"Yours, D. L."

This was evidently for Caryl. He looked at the envelope and saw that it was addressed simply to "Mr. Lingard." Mrs. Locke had probably given it to some boy to deliver, and he knowing only one Mr. Lingard had brought it to High Ashes by mistake. It must be sent to Caryl without delay. Better still, Douglas resolved to take it himself and explain why he had opened it.

He found Caryl very much as he had found him before, lying on his back on the sofa in the darkened room. The landlord who took him up to the room, said to him, confidentially, that "Mr. Lingard do seem mortal sick and ought to hev a doctor."

"I am glad you have come, Earl," he said, as he recognized Douglas. "I have decided to do what you ask and I should like you to take the check to Martin Hamerton yourself. I am too ill to go and I dislike to trust it to a messenger. The messengers here seem so stupid."

"They are," said Douglas, "and it is a mistake of one of them that has brought me here now."

Douglas handed his brother Mrs. Locke's letter and its enclosure, and told him how they had fallen into his hands.

"Oh, that is from Frank Allardyce," said Caryl, as he looked at the telegram. "It does not signify. I have had a telegram from him since that one was sent, and it appears there is now no need for me to go to him. His father is much better. Ah, this is Mrs. Locke's note. Odd it never occurred to me before; our Cousin Dora's initials are the same as yours, Earl, 'D.L.' Did you ever notice it?"

"No," said Douglas indifferently, being too much agitated about other matters to trouble himself about Mrs. Locke's initials.

"Well, I will get you to take this check to Hamerton at once to put him out of his misery, and then I want you to come right back to me. There was something you said about yourself that I must have explained."

"Let that stand over," said Douglas. "You are ill, Caryl, and you don't want to go over old troubles. I will come back as you wish it, but I want you to let me bring a doctor with me."

"Do you know of a good one in this neighborhood? If you do, I think I should like to see him. I thought this was only the remains of the sunstroke, but it may be something else."

"I was sick some time ago and had a very intelligent doctor. You will like him. I will look round on Fosbrook as I come back and bring him in. You don't want to be bothered with gratitude just now, otherwise I should like to tell you how grateful I am for what you are doing for the Hamertons. I am more grateful than if you had done it for me."

"Well, well," said Caryl, "say no more. Get the business done and come back as speedily as you can. I cannot rest till we have settled that other matter of your own."

"You are not well enough for that, Caryl. Let it rest for a time."

"Not for an hour. I suspect I have been deceived and I cannot be at peace till I know the truth. Now get you gone and let nothing prevent your coming back immediately."

Douglas hurried away on his errand. It was a pleasant task and his heart thrilled as Martin Hamerton, clasping both his hands, poured out his thanks. He would have gone at once to Caryl, but Douglas would not permit it. "Wait till he is over this sickness," he said. "I am going to take Fosbrook to him now and then we shall know what it amounts to. I will tell him you wanted to come and that will be enough. You shall see him as soon as he is able to talk. In the meantime do not speak of his illness. It might endanger the election. If he gets worse, of course it must be made known; but at present it should be kept secret."

On his way back, Douglas called on the surgeon, but he was out visiting patients and all that could be done was to leave a message begging him to come to Caryl's hotel as speedily as possible. Thither Douglas himself went, wondering whether a quarrel or a reconciliation was before him. "Not a quarrel," he said to himself. "Whatever happens, that must not; especially while he is sick. I will do all I can for him now, let the future bring what it may."

Caryl was lying with his face turned away from the light, and his hands over his eyes.

"Now I can tell by your voice," he said, "that Hamerton's affair is all right. Spare me all of that and come and answer me a few questions before the doctor comes. We have both held our tongues long enough, and I am not sure that we have not both been wrong."

A pair of brothers must both have been "grown up" for more years than had the two Lingards before the voice of the elder ceases to have for the younger the echo of the tone of lawful authority, when he wills to have it so. Douglas came and sat down, prepared to be questioned, in spite of his belief that what had waited so long to be cleared up had better now wait a little longer.

"I'm forgetting!" went on Caryl, the next instant; "I have no right now to question you about your private affairs. But will you forgive me, just for to-night, Earl? I'm not in a position to stand on ceremony, and we don't know when we may talk together like this again. Let us make believe that I have still the right to call you to order, as if we were at school again, and it was a question of what had become of your term's pocket-money."

"Ask me what you like," said Douglas gravely. "We did not tell each other everything, even in those days, but at least we never told each other anything but the truth."

"I know that, and therefore I believed you absolutely when you told me that it was not it your power to do anything yourself for Mr. Hamerton. But there was something else you said that I cannot have understood rightly. . . . What has become of the money my uncle gave you?—for you had never any heavy debts to pay. I took care to ascertain that."

Douglas drew a long breath, and answered after a moment very deliberately:

"The last money my uncle gave me was a five-pound note [$25] on my twenty-first birthday. I really don't remember now exactly what I did with it."

Caryl started, took his hand from his face, and looked at him.

"Do you mean that? I beg your pardon—I'm not doubting your word, but I don't know how far I understand. Did not my uncle give you very large sums on three different occasions? I could give you dates and accounts if I had his account-book here, for I have seen the entries in his own writing—two thousand pounds [$10,000] on the third of November, just a month before I came home, I know was the last of them."

"On my honor as a gentleman, he never did!"

Caryl sat up, caught his brother's hands in his, and looked into his face with eyes that for a moment had lost the mist that had dimmed them.

"Then God forgive me," he said, as he dropped back, "for somehow I have been made the fool of a lie!"

"In justice to myself, I must tell you all from the beginning," he said. "You must know what I had to go upon, and perhaps you may help me to get to the bottom. It began while I was in India.

There was a knock at the door and Dr. Fosbrook entered. "Do not go away, Earl," Caryl said, when Douglas was returning after having introduced the young surgeon. "I shall want to see you after the doctor has prescribed for me and it will worry me if I cannot find you."

WHITE BREAD STARVES

A piece of bread that is dry, white and very light in weight seems to the thoughtful person like so much foam or other useless and non-nourishing product.

If one rolls a piece of moist, light bread or the interior of a biscuit between the fingers, a ball of dough is the result, with an appearance of solidity that makes one question how the gastric juices of the stomach can dissolve such a wad.

It is small wonder that such food creates havoc in the way of fermentation and gas and consequent disorder.

Many dyspeptics will find great help by leaving off the ordinary bread entirely and using in its place Grape-Nuts, in which the starchy and nitrogenous substances have been thoroughly and perfectly cooked at the factory before being sent out.

There is no possibility of the food assuming the form of wads of dough. On the contrary, the food is already predigested, the starch of the grains has been changed into grape sugar in the process of manufacture and passes quickly and directly into circulation.

Grape-Nuts furnish the elements needed by the system to rebuild, particularly the soft gray matter in the brain and throughout the nerve centers in the body. This statement will be verified by use of the new food. It is delicious enough to recommend itself, upon trial.

All first-class grocers sell Grape-Nuts and the Postum Co. at Battle Creek, Mich., make them.

Mrs. Harriet Begole, of Ypsilanti, Mich., a sister-in-law of Mr. Joshua Begole, who was governor of Michigan, in 1883-4, is the excellent authority for a cure which is regarded in Michigan as almost a miracle. She says:

"In 1886 I suffered from a severe illness: during which my voice left me and I did not speak above a whisper for nearly 13 years.

"I was treated by five local physicians and afterward consulted leading specialists of N. Y. They diagnosed my case as partial paralysis, stating that the left side of my throat was entirely paralyzed, the right side partially so. For nearly eight years I have suffered from a severe stomach disorder and about a year ago I decided to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People.

"My stomach trouble was relieved, my general health became greatly improved, and to my surprise I regained control of my vocal organs. I have used five boxes of the pills and last November I spoke aloud for the first time in almost 13 years. I am now 71 years of age and have full control of my voice."

THE EDISON
PHONOGRAPH

The Edison Phonograph reproduces clearer, louder and more naturally than other talking machines because the diaphragm is held in a rigid frame and must transform all the mechanical vibrations into sound. All others have for the diaphragm a movable support, which absorbs the vibrations (thus reducing the clearness and volume of the result).

Wonderful Remedy for Rheumatism

DR. J. G. CONNOR, Ionia, Mich., writes:

DEAR SIRS:--An old friend of mine handed me a couple of small vials of your TARTARLITHINE some time ago and I tried it on myself, having suffered from rheumatism for several years. I assure you I was so pleased with its effects that I procured a full sized bottle, and since taking it I have been entirely free from rheumatism during the past year. I also observed that it is not surpassed by any other preparation as a PROMPT and EFFICIENT diuretic; besides it is pleasant to administer. Please send me a few bottles for use among my patients afflicted with Rheumatism.

Tartarlithine is supplied in bottles containing 50 doses at $1.00, and can be obtained of all druggists or post-free by mail.

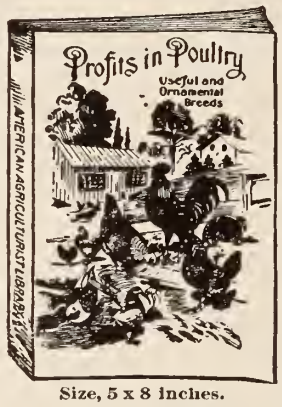
"THE BEST POULTRY BOOK ON THE MARKET."

PROFITS IN POULTRY



Size, 5 x 8 inches.

Contains 352 Pages, 154 Illustrations, Illuminated Cover, and 18 Color Plates of Leading Breeds.

By JAMES RANKIN, P. H. JACOBS, T. M. FERRIS, BURR KNAPP, W. H. RUDD, and others. Edited by the Poultry Editor American Agriculturist.

This new, revised and enlarged edition of what has always been recognized as the standard work on poultry, is nearly one-third larger than any previous edition, and has been fully brought up to the requirements of the present day. The ways and means by which eggs or poultry can he grown at a profit are discussed in great detail.

The chapter on artificial incubation alone is worth many times the price of the book to anyone engaged in poultry raising as a business. Care of chicks, diseases and their treatment, feeding and care for eggs, or for meat, building coops and houses, caponizing, marketing, warfare against pests, raising waterfowl and ornamental poultry, are described at length. The reference matter and tables are a special feature of the book. Experience of breeders and poultry farmers has been drawn upon freely, resulting in that breadth of view which can be obtained only by comparison of successful methods in actual practice.

FREE to Every Reader of THIS JOURNAL. This great work was never before sold for less than $1, but we have printed an enormous edition (paper covers), and will send it to every subscriber to the weekly American Agriculturist for three months, on receipt of only 35 cents postpaid, provided you mention where you saw this ad. This offer is to new subscribers only. Everybody knows the sterling merit of this great agricultural weekly (formerly monthly). Its poultry department alone is worth the year's subscription price. It is now published in three editions. You get the western edition (Orange Judd Farmer of Chicago) if you live in the west; the American Agriculturist edition if you live in the middle or southern states, and the eastern editiou (The New England Homestead of Springfield), if you live in N. E. or the Provinces.

Send 35 cents in silver or stamps; the book will follow in a few days, and for three months the edition of the American Agriculturist circulating in your own state, containing the markets and special local features characteristic of your section. This offer is not good unless you mention the paper in which you saw this advertisement.

MONEY-IN-POULTRY CONTEST. A colossal scheme inaugurated by the American Agriculturist to increase the profit and lessen the work of poultry culture. The prize list is headed by $500 in gold contributed by American Agriculturist, as a starter. Other contributions will probably swell the list to hundreds of prizes exceeding $5000 in value. Full particulars free to every one who sends us 35 cents for American Agriculturist three months and the color plate book "Profits in Poultry"—$1.75 worth for only 35 cents. Your money back if not satisfied. We were established in 1842. You can depend upon us.

Bronchitis, Asthma, Chronic Pneumonia and Catarrh can be cured by DR. ROBERT HUNTER'S method of treatment by which the curative drugs are introduced directly into the bronchial tubes and lungs, and not put into the stomach, where they become useless.

Mrs. A. L. Peer, 179 Washington street, Newark, N. J., says: "I had 27 hemorrhages, and lost 50 pounds in weight; I was cured by Dr. Hunter's treatment."

Mrs. Edward Raynor, 174 Bank street, Newark, N. J., says: "I had the worst symptoms of consumption — fever, night sweats, hemorrhages, great shortness of breath and loss of flesh, and I owe my recovery to Dr. Hunter's treatment."

Readers of this paper can receive, FREE, a book explaining the causes, symptoms and treatment of the various bronchial and lung diseases by sending their address to Dr. Robert Hunter Association, 117 West 45th Street, New York City.

THE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

ew People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is he safest and most efficient disinfectant and urifier in nature, but few realize its value hen taken into the human system for the ame cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you ake of it the better. it is not a drug at all, ut simply absorbs the gases and impurities lways present in the stomach and intestines nd carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smok- ng, drinking or after eating onions and other dorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves he complexion, it whitens the teeth and fur- her acts as a natural and safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect n the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the outh and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggests sell charcoal in one form or nother, but probably the best charcoal and he most for the money is in Stuart's Absorb- nt Lozenges; they are composed of the nest powdered Willow charcoal, and other armless antiseptics in tablet form or rather n the form of large, pleasant tasting lozen- es, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon ell in a much improved condition of the eneral health, better complexion, sweeter reath and purer blood, and the beauty of it s, that no possible harm can result from their ontinued use, but on the contrary great enefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the enefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's bsorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering rom gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear he complexion and purify the breath, mouth nd throat; I also believe the liver is greatly enefitted by the daily use of them; they cost ut twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and lthough in some sense a patent preparation et I believe I get more and better charcoal n Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of he ordinary charcoal tablets."

MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL USE

OXYDONOR

AFTER SUNDAY'S EXHAUSTIVE WORK

REV. HENRY L. PHILLIPS, Rector of Crucifixion Protestant Church, Philadelphia, 1422 Lombard Street, writes Oct. 21, 1899: "For colds and Rheumatism I find Oxydonor a most helpful servant. Have used it successfully in my family. As a tonic after Sunday's hard work, it is simply invaluable."

REV. R. R. ALBIN, Pastor Calvary Baptist Church, Shenandoah, Pa., writes Nov. 17, 1899: "Oxydonor wonderfully relieved me of Neuralgia, and I found it very helpful in Rheumatism. Also found Oxydonor very helpful after my Sunday's work as a preacher, by using it on that night, so that Monday morning found me refreshed. Would advise all ministers to try Oxydonor."

Oxydonor supplies the vital energy which prompts and supports the highest physical effort and renders possible grand mental results.

Oxydonor, in short, is Life. It is a simple instrument, which compels the body to absorb large quantities of healing, health-giving Oxygen from the air through the lungs, membranes and skin, thus transforming disease into Health and Vigorous Life.

Oxydonor will keep a family in good health, and with ordinary care it lasts a lifetime and saves the ruinous costs of sickness. Full instructions with each one.

We have thousands of reports of cures from Clergymen, doctors, lawyers, bankers and prominent men and women from all parts of the country. We will mail our books free to any address sent us.

Letters asking for further information will receive prompt reply.

Our Consul and His Pet

HONG KONG was invested with a new interest for Americans from the moment the first cablegram came from Dewey via that city, announcing his great victory. For a time all our news came through that port or from Madrid. Hong Kong has been a point of large importance to the insurgents, also, for ammunition and other supplies have reached them from that city. Our Consul at this Chino-English port has therefore, filled a delicate and responsible position; and perhaps our readers may be pleased to see his picture. The photograph we present shows Consul Wildman with his tiger-cub pet. The rather formidable pet will doubtless command the interest of many readers, who would rather expend their affection on some tamer and and less dangerous playmate.

MR. WILDMAN'S TIGER-CUB

The Bowery Mission's Need

The Bowery Mission is sorely in need of funds, owing to the extra strain resulting from the unusually large influx of strangers who come to the city in quest of work and who, disappointed for a time, are in need of temporary assistance. The Mission is open to all, and endeavors as far as its means will permit, to assist these men while looking for employment. It is said that two hundred and fifty thousand men have left their country homes, encouraged by the glowing reports of prosperity, and have come to the city to share in the advantages. Every section of the country has contributed its quota, and as we dare not turn these men away, we appeal to every home that has a boy in the metropolis, to aid in bearing this exceptional burden. A few dollars will go a great way.

We need at least fifteen hundred dollars more to carry us through the inclement season. You may be very much in sympathy with this effort to help homeless men, and we are very thankful for such sympathy; but in a cash contribution it will find peculiarly practical and highly acceptable expression.

If you have any serviceable clothing to donate, please send it to the Bowery Mission, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City, and prepay the charges, which usually are very light.

Burned His Infidel Books

Marshall O. Waggoner, of Toledo, O., the converted infidel whose determination to burn his infidel library was announced in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few weeks ago, has done according to his promise. His large collection of atheistic books, supplemented by numerous etchings and engravings of an infidel character, was committed to the furnace in the basement of the United Brethren Church in Toledo, on the night of January 18th. Among the books were copies of almost every valuable infidel or agnostic work known to modern controversialists, from Paine's Age of Reason and Voltaire's famous volumes, down to the writings of Ingersoll. Only a few persons were present at the literary conflagration. When all the books had been burned, Mr. Waggoner told anew to the small gathering of spectators the story of his conversion.

First, the Kingdom of God

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 11. Matt. 13: 44-46

ONE of the instructive spectacles presented to Bunyan's pilgrim, was that of a man with a rake. This man was so busily engaged in raking together bits of straw—his eyes were so fixed on the rubbish he was gathering—that he did not see an angel who was hovering above him and trying to get his attention. The angel was offering the man a gold crown, but the man did not see it. All his mind was so intent on the accumulated sticks and straws, that he never looked up. One would long to speak to such a man, to call his attention to the treasure he was missing. If some visitant from the life beyond the grave came to this world, how often he must have that longing! Knowing, as he would do, the real value of things, he would be grieved to see men so intent on business and the gathering of a fortune, or so earnestly seeking fame or pleasure, that they were likely to miss eternal life, the greatest boon ever offered to man. If he could make himself heard, he would tell the man to secure the treasure first of all, to make the getting of that his chief business, and then to go on with less important matters. There are duties in life that we ought to perform, matters which, so long as we are in the flesh, we should attend to; but the spiritual matter should be attended to first, because it is the most important.

Firemen tell us that when a sudden alarm of fire is given, the persons in peril seldom save the things that are most valuable. In their distraction they generally snatch up something worthless to carry out of the fire, and leave valuable things behind. Afterwards they realize that they should have saved something else, but at the moment they have not presence of mind. It is this failure in the affairs of life that Christ's teaching was designed to correct. He would have us understand what is really important, and what has importance only for this life. The first thing to seek, he says, is the kingdom of God. If it can be gained only by sacrificing everything else, it is better to make the sacrifice. The man who finds a treasure, gets rid of all his possessions that he may secure that; the merchant who finds in the market a pearl, that is the finest pearl he has seen, sells all he has, that he may purchase it. Christ would have us so intent on entering the kingdom of God that we would give up everything that stands in our way. When the French were preparing to defend Paris against the German army in 1870, they destroyed a number of beautiful villas which stood in the way of the guns. They had no wish to destroy property, but the safety of the city was the first consideration, so they sacrificed everything that might hinder them in securing it. When a great fire is devastating a city, and the firemen realize that the only way to check it is to create a great gap that the flames cannot overleap, they have no hesitation about blowing up a few houses with dynamite. It is a pity to destroy the houses, but if a large section of the city can be saved by doing it, they will destroy them. So, it becomes a matter of relative importance, and the wise course is to make a sacrifice, if one be necessary, to secure something of greater importance.

This is the principle on which Christ's argument is based. There is nothing so important to any man as his entrance into the kingdom of God. Therefore that should be his chief concern. He must do his duty in the world; he should provide for his wife and family; but the entrance into the kingdom of God is the main thing. That should be attended to first. If some poor man, knowing the value of an education, denies himself in order to send his son to college, telling him at the outset that he hopes to see him become a great lawyer or doctor, how disappointed he would be if his son failed to pass his examinations and came back as ignorant as he went! The father would not be consoled by hearing that his son had been foremost in the football field, or stroke of the college boat. He might admire athletics, but he would say to his son, You should have made the getting of an education your first concern.

Became Poor for Christ's Sake

A Pennsylvania Pastor Who Renounced Pulpit, Salary and Property that He Might Preach for Nothing to the Unshepherded

RARELY, indeed, in this money-making age, when even the churches seem mercenary, do we hear of the voluntary surrender of income and position for the Master's sake. Yet such is the story that comes from the town of Aspinwall, ., where Rev. W. J. Gillespie, pastor the United Presbyterian church, some-he ago gave up his pulpit and a salary $1.000 a year in order that he might each the Gospel "without money and thout price." His resignation is now the hands of the Allegheny Presbytery. is personal sacrifice has not been ade without due consideration. The urch is a prosperous one, and the par- held many attractions that would have used most pastors to hesitate before king the step that led to absolute sever- ce. But Mr. Gillespie had thought the tter out fully and had prayed earnestly er it, and finally came to the conclusion t the church no longer needed him: it uld pay the salary to some other incum- nt, while he could carry out his long- erished dream of devoting himself to e spiritual needs of some unshepherded ck, too poor to pay a pastor.

But Mr. Gillespie's programme of re- nciation called for the sacrifice of more an his pulpit and salary. At fifty-seven ars of age, he resolved to strip himself all his worldly possessions before tak- g up the Gospel work, as did the apos- s and teachers of old, without purse or ip, and trusting wholly to the Lord. hat little property he possessed, he nsferred to his wife as a provision ainst the necessities of old age. This ne, he was ready to go wherever the ll might lead him, to preach Christ to e poor and to minister among those o had no religious privileges. He be- ves that the Master intended that his fol- lvers should teach and preach in this way. Mr. Gillespie's letter explains fully the otives that led up to the decisive step ich has changed the whole character his life-work. He writes:

I was born near Ballynahinch, County own, Ireland, October 3d, 1842. My ther died when I was eight years old, aving my mother with two children, my ster being two years younger than I. ather had destined me for the ministry. y mother kept this fact steadily before e. In 1857 she brought us to America d settled in Newburg, N. Y., where she mained until her death, in 1891.

I was converted in 1859 under the min- ry of the Rev. J. R. Thompson, then d still pastor of the Westminster Re- rmed Presbyterian Congregation in ewburg, and joined his congregation. the spring of 1862 I went to Westmin- er College, New Wilmington, Pa., and aduated in the class of 1866. Mean- hile, I had enlisted, in June, 1863, and rved with the 55th Pennsylvania Vol nteer Infantry until discharged by rea- n of termination of term of service. I studied theology for three years in Allegheny under the late Drs. Sprout and J. R. W. Sloane. After graduation I spent a few months as a missionary in Minnesota, three hundred miles northwest of St. Paul.

In 1870 I was installed pastor of the United Presbyterian church, in Sparta, Ill., where I continued until called to the United Presbyterian Church, in Charles street, New York. In 1872 I married Jennie, only child of the late James B. Wier of Sparta, Ill., a wealthy farmer and a good man. We have one child, a daughter, who is married to Dr. C. Otis Boynton.

In June, 1886, I went to Leavenworth, Kan., and in July began the chaplain's work at the National Soldiers' Home, located there. I continued in this position until after my daughter's marriage broke up my home. In anticipation of this event I had determined that, if God made it possible, I would preach as the early ministers did—without any commercial contract. Meanwhile, my wife had inherited some property from her father, and I deeded to her what real estate we had, and gave our daughter what little cash we had on hand. I was thus left without any worldly cares, and had provided for the support of my family, which I hold every Christian man is bound to do. I had reason to know that there were many weak congregations unable to support a pastor. I also found that the ministry was looking for the churches paying the largest salaries. This, I thought, could not be God's way.

Only a few days ago, since offering my resignation, I heard of two congregations in Southern Illinois whose pastors had resigned. Neither of the congregations pay more than one thousand dollars a year, yet one had sixty-five applications from ministerial candidates; the other forty-four. To my positive knowledge there are congregations within fifty miles of Pittsburg, in needy localities, pastorless because they cannot pay more than five or six hundred dollars a year.

I hold that, according to the Word of God, every man who feels himself called into the ministry is at liberty to give his message to any who will listen, without making any previous bargain for so much a month or year, as though working under a business contract. I do not lay down any law for other men, only that I am free, and any man may be free to carry the Gospel into any open door without first making a business contract. I believe, also, that this will solve some of the difficult problems now before the Church. The great masses are not to be reached by mercantile methods.

I have thus given a few facts, and my reasons for offering my services to some unshepherded flock. That such a course was wise and pleasing to God I now know by the number of letters I have received, all the way from New York to Washington, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Minnesota, and even Canada. Why so much attention has been given to it, I do not know, unless it be that the Lord Jesus wants other men to do likewise.

Yours, In His Name,
W. J. GILLESPIE.

Contains 756 large, octavo pages, handsomely and strongly bound in cloth. Christians of all denominations know that Scripture is the best interpreter of Scripture, and, next to the sacred writings, no volume better deserves a place in the library of the Bible student than Cruden's Concordance to the Holy Scriptures.

JAMIESON, FAUSSET, AND BROWN'S BIBLE COMMENTARY

By Robert Jamieson, D.D., St. Paul's, Glasgow.
Rev. A. R. Fausset, A.M., St. Cuthbert's, York, and David Brown, D.D., Professor of Theology, Aberdeen.
A complete commentary—critical, explanatory and practical—on the Old and New Testament—1380 pages, bound in cloth.

It is enriched with the results of learning, the researches of travelers who have visited every region on which the light of revelation originally shone, and the expository labors of scholars and critics. Far in advance of the older works now in use, this explanatory and practical commentary has been prepared by three eminent divines, distinguished alike for their scholarship and their piety. While this is the most practical, suggestive, scientific and popular commentary yet published in this country, its compact form and convenient size, together with the immense amount of matter it contains, forming an encyclopædia of biblical knowledge, render it also at once the cheapest and most economical.

Rev. H. Clay Trumbull, Editor of The Sunday School Times: I do not know of its equal, within its scope and cost, and I believe it will have, as it merits, a very wide circulation, and will do great good.

Rev. John H. Vincent, Bishop M. E. Church: "This immense book deserves a place on the table of every Bible student. It is the cream of the commentaries carefully collected by three eminent scholars."

EDERSHEIM'S LIFE AND TIMES OF JESUS THE MESSIAH (2 Vols.)

The Authorized American Edition. By Alfred Edersheim, M.A., Oxon, D.D., Lecturer Oxford University.

Two volumes, regular price $6.00. Royal 8vo, 1,524 pages, handsomely bound in silk cloth.

A famous book for clergyman, student or general reader. Its long continued success and the many favorable notices are sufficient evidence of the popularity this new edition will achieve. Gives a full account of the society, life and development—intellectual and religious—in Palestine, to serve as a frame and background for the picture of Christ. The fresh study of the text of the Gospels makes the book a historical commentary on the Four Gospels.

This great life of Christ will prove particularly valuable to every Sunday School worker, as the International Lessons will be on the life of Christ for eighteen months.

The Sunday School Times recommends it: "It is positively refreshing to read a life of the Saviour which is critical in the best and truest sense of the word, and is biblical at the same time. The book is written not for the learned alone, but rather for the generally intelligent Christian reader."

Questions of the Week

1. Would it be wise for the Federal Government to undertake a pension system whereby a stated number of annual payments on the part of any citizen, male or female, should ensure the individual an annual endowment for the remainder of life?

It might be very wise if regulated by the principles adopted by reliable insurance companies in the payment of annuities. It would promote thrift. The plan could be operated very cheaply through the Post Office Department. Investors would have the credit of the government to secure them; consequently they would have an interest in defending the government against foreign foes and domestic insurrection and against loose financial legislation or theories which would impair its credit. The plan of government pensions is in vogue in Germany, where it is compulsory. Of course the element of compulsion would not answer in the United States under our constitution. H. C. UNDERHILL.

2. Judged from results, direct or indirect, what book by an American author has been most effective for good?

Ten Nights in a Bar Room has proved most effective in the cause of temperance. Its influence has been widespread and wonderful. Its graphic and faithful portrayal of the evils of intemperance aroused people of all classes. Its logic was the logic of facts, and it has wielded tremendous power. In His Steps has had an influence decidedly unique in the realm of practical benevolence. Looking Backward has started a revolutionary movement without precedent in social life. Uncle Tom's Cabin did more than any other book to arouse antagonism to slavery. E. L. GRAHAM.

3. What is the best method of systematic domestic charity?

The Church of Christ should be the almoner of domestic charity. Where there is only one church in a locality, it is not impossible for its members to keep well acquainted with all cases of need in the community. In places in which more than one church exists, the work should be divided by consent. In rendering benevolence, effort should be made to denude it of all mere officialism. In large cities, the churches may do their work better by organization, but this should not prevent the contact between wise and warm-hearted representatives of the church and the needy ones who are to be helped. R. T. HOLT.

4. Which is the more important and useful invention, the telegraph or the telephone?

The telegraph. Through it the news of the world is gathered, large business transactions are consummated and the conveniences of social life are forwarded. The loss of the telegraph would prove a more serious calamity to the world than the loss of the telephone. The United States government proved the value of the telegraph during its war with Spain and has continued to do so since then in its military operations in its new possessions. M. T. MILNER.

5. What number of insane, feeble-minded, blind, and deaf and dumb people are there in the United States?

The United States census for 1890 furnished the following statistics: Total number of insane persons, 106,485; whites, 99,719; negroes, 6,535; Chinese, Japanese and civilized Indians, 231; males, 53,473; females, 53,012. Total number of feeble-minded persons, 95,609; whites, 84,997; negroes, 10,574; others, 38; males, 52,962; females, 42,647. Total number of blind persons, 50,568; whites, 43,351; negroes, 7,060; others, 157; males, 28,080; females, 22,488. Blind in one eye, 93,988. Total number of deaf and dumb persons, 40,592; whites, 37,447; negroes, 3,115; others, 30; males, 22,429; females, 18,163. There were also 121,178 persons unable to hear even loud conversation, of whom 80,611 were able to speak. Reports from thirty States to the Commission on States of the National Conference of Charity and Correction, showed 102,000 insane persons in 1896. At that rate there would be in the United States 145,000 insane persons. The percentage of insane to population in 1890 was 3.87 for foreign whites, 1.40 for native whites and .886 colored. S. M. MERCER.

6. In what country of the world is the proportion of suicides to the population the greatest, and where does the United States rank in the list?

According to the most reliable statistics (Barker's), the average rate of suicides per 100,000 population in countries everywhere from which statistics have been obtained is as follows: Saxony, 31.1; Denmark, 25.8; Schleswig-Holstein, 24; Austria, 21.2; Switzerland, 20.2; France, 15.7; German Empire, 14.3; Hanover, 14; Queensland, 13.5; Prussia, 13.3; Victoria, 11.5; New South Wales, 9.3; Bavaria, 9.1; New Zealand, 9; South Australia, 8.9; Sweden, 8.1; Norway, 7.5; Belgium, 6.9; England and Wales, 6.9; Tasmania, 5.3; Hungary, 5.2; Scotland, 4; Italy, 3.7; Netherlands, 3.6; United States, 3.5; Russia, 2.9; Ireland, 1.7; Spain, 1.4. No statistics are obtainable for countries in Asia, Africa or South America. The cause per 100 suicides are reported as follows: Insanity and delirium, 32; crime, vice, 22; alcoholism, 11; remorse of conscience, 6; family quarrels, 4; want, hunger, 4; diseases, 2; unknown reasons, 19. Paris furnishes the highest number of suicides per 100,000 population of any European city, averaging 42 per 100,000. In the United States, St. Louis seems to lead the list with 25.6 per 100,000 population. C. R. KIMBALL.

7. Is open or concealed sin the greater in the sight of God?

If sin is judged by God according to its results, and these only he can estimate, some specific cases of open sin might be deemed worse than some specific cases of concealed sin. Concealed, in this instance, simply means concealed from man, that is, sin committed in secret. Sin committed openly, has an element of open defiance toward God that adds to its heinousness, and it suggests the possibility of leading others into sin by force of brazen example. But secret sin has in it the element of hypocrisy, and no sin is more severely denounced by Christ than this. There is certainly nothing in Scripture that can afford any comfort to the secret violator of God's laws, on the ground that he might have committed greater offence had he been more open in his transgression. C. M. BANKS.

8. What is the fastest speed of a railroad train on record?

The fastest time on record was made by the Empire State Express on the New York Central and H. R. R., May 11, 1893, in a run of one mile from Crittenden, west, which was made in thirty-two seconds, being equal to 112 1-2 miles an hour. This was done with locomotive No. 999, the engineer being Charles Hogan. GRANT L. BICE.

A number of correspondents cite the case of a train on the Burlington Route which in January, 1899, made the run from Sidney to Arion, 2 1-4 miles, in one minute and twenty seconds and claim that the time made was 130 miles an hour; but a very simple calculation shows that the speed was only 108 miles an hour. EDITOR, MAIL-BAG.

9. Does man's brain continue to grow or otherwise, with advancing years?

Our best anatomists claim that the brain grows rapidly for the first seven years of life, less rapidly then on to the twentieth year, and still less so from this period on to forty, at which period it is said to reach its maximum. Beyond this limit, the brain is said to diminish slowly in weight, about one ounce for each decennial advance. Average brain weight in man is 49 1-2 ounces; in the female, some five or six ounces less. Brain weight is not always indicative of intellectuality; it is rather potential. In many instances it is a talent not developed, but wrapped in the napkin of neglect. Many a man with strong brain capacity goes through life with no more revelation of power than mediocrity gives. Another, with half the brain capacity, so improves and develops his potentiality as to increase and glorify his life, and in the race of progress far outstrips the less active man of greater capacity. ROBERT H. GOODIER, M.D.

10. Was Judas a subject of prophecy in the sense that he had been chosen before hand for the ignominious role he filled, or was he a moral free agent, capable of rejecting temptation to treachery and of desiring to act the part of a righteous disciple?

The question is a very hard one to answer. It is contended on the one side that Judas, as an absolutely free moral agent, could not have been chosen beforehand as the betrayer of Christ. The other and very general view among Christians, is that the act of Judas was foreshadowed, but that he was not predestined to betray the Lord. The question opens up the ever-present problem between God's foreknowledge and man's free will—a problem that cannot be solved in this life. Judas was undoubtedly responsible for his act. C. S. MARTIN.

Miscellaneous Questions

Luella H., Raleigh, N. C. You give Herodias' daughter the name Salome. Is her name thus recorded in the Bible?

No, but Josephus, the Jewish historian (Antiquities 18: 5, 4) and Nicephorus both identify her as Salome, the daughter of Herodias and Philip.

Buffalo, N. Y. My son wishes to have my consent to his keeping company with a Roman Catholic young lady (we being Protestants) with a view to marriage. Please advise me what to do about it.

Such unions usually turn out disappointingly if not disastrously. There can be no community of spiritual interest, such as should exist between husband and wife, and the happiness of both is in jeopardy. Their children's faith, too, is sure to be a bone of contention. Even the most conservative are agreed that such marriages are unwise and in the nature of an "unequal yoke."

The Last Call

THE announcement that hereafter twenty indestructible music rollers, worth $6.00, would accompany each of our Concert Roller Organs, which we are offering at $10.00, has given to the sale of these instruments such an impetus that the one thousand organs, which we purchased for the exclusive benefit of the members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family, will be fully disposed of within a very few days. We sound this final call that all those who really want one of these instruments, incomparable for cottage prayer-meetings, country Sunday Schools, young people's meetings, home worship and social entertainments, may take warning and act at once lest they be too late, for under no circumstances will we send out more than the one thousand instruments originally provided, and at the present time there are certainly not more than a hundred left—and hardly that many. The price is $10, and for that sum we send the organ and twenty pieces of music of your own selection from the list published in our issue of December 27th, 1899. If that issue should not be convenient for reference send us word and we will send you a catalogue of a thousand pieces of music, from which you may select any twenty, and these will be sent to you boxed with the organ. The purchaser pays the freight, which is very light. The size of the Concert Roller organ is 19 inches in length, 16 inches in width and 14 inches in height. Do not miss this golden opportunity. Pastor Sheldon's Christian Daily

The Great Experiment of Conducting a Newspaper in Accordance With the Teachings of Christ, to be Begun on March 13th, 1900

SITTING in a small church on the edge of Tennesseetown, a negro suburb of Topeka, Kan., a few days ago, I tried hard to realize that the pastor had been preaching, during the last two years, in fourteen different languages to the largest congregations of any preacher of the century. It seemed a paradox too wild even for conjecture. The roar from the shaking cedars of Lebanon, borne in from all the world, was so loud, surely, to have come from a seed planted here. A miracle it seemed, and miracle it may have been; but fact, at all events, it certainly was, for I was sitting in the church study of Charles M. Sheldon, author of In His Steps.

The strong, benignant faces of Phillips Brooks and Principal Bancroft of Andover, looked down from a desk's top: on the wall above them was the inscription, "Thy Kingdom Come;" directly opposite were photographs of negro children gathered in busy kindergartens, and other pictured evidences of earnest work to bring the Kingdom. On the other side of a partition, was a larger room in which a serial story was read on Sunday evenings four years ago, which has found the printed page and gone, in many different tongues, to 20,000,000 readers.

It was in this setting that I met Mr. Sheldon. He was quiet, serene, modest almost to shyness. His deep gray eyes were lighted with strong purpose and kindliness. Even if one knew nothing of the man's life and work, I think the impression would be irresistible that those eyes looked from a soul in which conscience was supreme. This impression would be at once confirmed by the directness and candor with which he met every question. Is a thing right or wrong? was the one touchstone of every decision.

Preparing for the Battle

I had been asked to be present at a conference between Mr. Sheldon and Mr. Frederick O. Popenoe, one of the owners of the Topeka Capital, at which the publication of a Christian daily paper was to be considered. Many preliminaries had already been agreed upon. This meeting was for the purpose of completing final arrangements. As a newspaper editor who had not infrequently a ten-column report of a prize fight, it was simply amazing to listen to the talk of a daily newspaper in which the prize fight would not receive so much space as a single line. Surely the publication office of such a paper would have to be in Utopia. But no; it was to be there in Topeka, for such was the clear agreement seriously made by two serious men. Mr. Sheldon, in short, was to have at last an opportunity, long desired, of showing to the world his idea of what a Christian daily newspaper ought to be.

It may interest the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to know something of the inception and development of this Sheldon idea, which is now to be embodied in an experiment that will certainly be unique in journalism. At the Christian Endeavor convention in Detroit last July, Mr. Sheldon asked this question:

"In this day, when philanthrophy munificently endows our institutions of learning, is there here a man who, recognizing the potency of the public press to make or mar our civilization, will contribute a million dollars to establish a daily Christian newspaper?"

That question provoked wide discussion. It went at once from the Christian Endeavor convention to the country. Some praised the plan of such a paper, others criticised it, and nearly all opinions agreed in considering the plan an important one. But no man answered the question with an offer to endow the enterprise. At length, as interest in the subject increased, the Topeka Capital decided to place its plant absolutely at Mr. Sheldon's disposal for the experiment. Such an offer, without conditions, was made and accepted, and March 13th next has been fixed upon as the date upon which the author of In His Steps will assume the entire editorial and business management of the leading newspaper in Kansas. He will continue his management for six consecutive issues, and his control for that week will be absolute. The Capital turns over its presses, type, franchises and advertisement contracts without reservation. It becomes simply a plant for the publication of the paper. The experiment will be an unfettered one in an open field.

Mr. Sheldon is now arranging all the details of his plans for publishing a Christian daily. He is in dead earnest in this as he is in everything. He feels that the press is one of the greatest of moral levers and that its lifting power will be immeasurably augmented if its tone can be elevated and purified. Personally, he shrinks from becoming the conspicuous factor in the experiment, for he desires rather to sink his own personality in his work.

A Man of Rare Modesty

During an industrious newspaper life, in which I have met "all sorts and conditions of men"—men with ideals and men without them—I have never met a man who impressed me so deeply with the genuineness of his desire to efface himself as did Charles M. Sheldon. His thought is directed singly on the work and what may come of it.

PASTOR SHELDON'S CHURCH AT TOPEKA, KAN.

As to the probable contents of his Christian daily newspaper, Mr. Sheldon himself cannot, as yet, speak definitely.

From the first to the last page it is to be Christian, but in no way sectarian or denominational. Its editorials, its news, its advertisements must satisfy the challenge, "What would Jesus do?" It is his intention to devote a large portion of the receipts, after covering expense, to Christian and philanthropic work.

In the course of an editorial announcement The Capital said:

As to the results from the object lesson which this Sheldon edition will afford, we would not venture a prediction. They are sure to be many; they may be revolutionary. A world that is reading millions of copies of In His Steps every year, and that is even now taking them by the thousand every day from scores of presses before the ink can dry on their pages, may be a world that is waiting for a daily paper modeled after that remarkable book. If it is, the world will get what the world wants. H. SHERMAN HOUSTON.

REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON

Who will edit the first thoroughly Christian daily newspaper the world has ever seen

"A Practical Idealist"

Bishop John H. Vincent, of the Methodist Church, a familiar acquaintance of Mr. Sheldon, thus describes the Kansas pastor:

"Mr. Sheldon is a dreamer. He has a strong, original and prolific imagination. He is a remarkable dreamer—a genius. Thus endowed, he is of necessity an idealist. His specialty is in the direction of philanthropy. While scholars in seminaries are speculating concerning sociological problems, Mr. Sheldon is experimenting; and as he dreams of the ideal possibility, he puts pen to paper and produces sanctified romance. He is a Christian Socialist—a practical idealist. As his standard of life is the Christ who assumed humanity to show man what to be and how to live, he naturally applies his Christian faith and power of idealization to the practical application of Christ and his ideas. He is humble, gentle, unselfish, declines public recognition, and is the same candid, simple-hearted Christian he has been through all these years."

What Will Mr. Sheldon Do?

Christian Herald Readers Invited to Help Him in His Undertaking

NO practical application of the great test question, "What would Jesus do?" has ever awakened such a deep and widespread interest as that undertaken by Pastor Sheldon, who will begin the publication of the Topeka Capital as a Christian daily newspaper on March 13. The whole country will watch with intense interest for the appearance of every issue of the Capital during the six days of his control. It was certainly a most courageous and commendable thing for Mr. Popenoe to surrender his property for such a purpose, without a single condition or limitation.

And now the universal question is: "What will Mr. Sheldon do?" Will he attack the corruptions and impurities in state and national politics? Will he unmask hypocrisy and vice in high places? Will he attempt reform on new and startling lines? Will he assail the policies of leading statesmen as venal and time-serving? Will the administration be arraigned on the liquor question? Will the churches be sternly rebuked for their lukewarmness? Will religious apostasy be set in the pillory? Will war and its advocates be declared abhorrent to the Master, and a violation of his teachings? Will a deep and far-reaching note of prophetic warning be uttered against a nation which loves gold better than God, and power and pleasure more than the things of the Kingdom? Will the dissipations of the age, in theatre, staked arena, ballroom and gambling hall be held up to scorn, as unworthy of a nation which professes to be Christian?

"What will Pastor Sheldon do?" will be asked, when the thousand and one offensive details of current crime come to the surface in his editorial rooms as printable news. What of the murders, the bigamies, the divorces, the assaults; the betting of the "sports" and the gambling of the exchanges; the pools, rings, corners and combinations for plunder and profit; the army of business humbugs and the vast array of professional nostrum vendors? Will he take fraud and deceit and imposition to task wherever found and unmask them, or will he pass them by in silence? Will he tell the truth about all things that come up for editorial judgment or simply condemn, by omission? Will he print a paper with the real news—not the veneered, polished and skilfully deceptive statement, but the bare, bald unameliorated Truth, without distortion?

The greatest, and in many respects the hardest, task of his life lies before Mr. Sheldon now. His is a heroic undertaking and God's people everywhere will hope and pray for his success. It may be, too, that they can help him at his work in a material way, and one which we believe he would greatly appreciate. He has yet several weeks of preparation before he assumes control of The Capital. We invite our readers to send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD any suggestions as to topics which they believe Mr. Sheldon could take up to advantage in his paper, and especially topics that will be helpful to the Christian cause. Every such suggestion forwarded to us will assuredly be placed in Mr. Sheldon's hands.

In last week's issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, it was stated that the price of the entire six Sheldon issues of The Capital would be 25 cents, "the same as any six regular issues." In this we were misinformed. We have since learned that the regular price of the paper is 10 cents per week—but that in order to meet the increased expenses incident to the Sheldon edition it has been advanced to 25 cents per week during his editorship.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

Captured Grindstones

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Samuel 13: 19-21:

"Now there was no smith found throughout all the land of Israel, for the Philistines said, Lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears. But all the Israelites went down to the Philistines, to sharpen every man his share, and his coulter and his ax, and his mattock. Yet they had a file for the mattocks, and for the coulters, and for the forks, and for the axes, and to sharpen the goads."

WHAT a galling subjugation for the Israelites! The Philistines had carried off all the blacksmiths, and torn down all the blacksmith's shops, and abolished the blacksmiths' trade in the land of Israel. The Philistines would not even allow these parties to work their valuable mines of brass and iron, nor might they make any swords or spears. There were only two swords left in all the land. Yea, these Philistines went on until they had taken all the grindstones from the land of Israel, so that if an Israelitish farmer wanted to sharpen his plow or his ax, he had to go over to the garrison of the Philistines to get it done. There was only one sharpening instrument left in the land, and that was a file; the farmers and mechanics having nothing to whet up the coulter, and the goad, and the pickaxe, save a simple file. Industry was hindered and work practically disgraced. The great idea of these Philistines was to keep the Israelites disarmed. They might get iron out of the hills to make swords of, but they would not have any blacksmiths to weld this iron. If they got the iron welded, they would have no grindstones on which to bring the instruments of agriculture or the military weapons up to an edge. Oh, you poor, weaponless Israelites, reduced to a file, how I pity you! But these Philistines were not forever to keep their heel on the neck of God's children. Jonathan, on his hands and knees, climbs up a great rock, beyond which were the Philistines; and his armor-bearer, on his hands and knees, climbs up the same rock, and these two men, with their two swords, hew to pieces the Philistines, the Lord throwing a great terror upon them. So it was then; so it is now. Two men of God on their knees mightier than a Philistine host on their feet!

I learn, first, from this subject, that it is dangerous for the Church of God to allow its weapons to stay in the hands of its enemies. These Israelites might again and again have obtained a supply of swords and weapons, as for instance, when they took the spoils of the Ammonites; but these Israelites seemed content to have no swords, no spears, no blacksmiths, no grindstones, no active iron mines, until it was too late for them to make any resistance. I see the farmers tugging along with their pickaxes and plow, and I say, "Where are you going with those things?" They say, "Oh, we are going over to the garrison of the Philistines, to get these things sharpened." I say, "You foolish men, why don't you sharpen them at home?" "Oh," they say, "the blacksmiths' shops are all torn down, and we have nothing left us but a file."

So it is in the Church of Jesus Christ to-day. We are too willing to give up our weapons to the enemy. The world boasts that it has gobbled up the schools, and the colleges, and the arts, and the sciences, and the literature, and the printing press. Infidelity is making a mighty attempt to get all our weapons in its hand, and then to keep them. You know it is making this boast all the time, and after a while, when the great battle between Sin and Righteousness has opened, if we do not look out we will be as badly off as these Israelites, without any swords to fight with and without any sharpening instruments.

The Tyndallean thinkers of our times are trying to get all the intellectual weapons in their own grasp. We want scientific Christians to capture the science, and scholastic Christians to capture the scholarship, and philosophic Christians to capture the philosophy, and lecturing Christians to take back the lecturing platform. We want to send out against Schenkel and Strauss and Renan a Theodore Christlieb, of Bonn, and against the infidel scientists of the day, a God-worshiping Silliman and Hitchcock and Agassiz. We want to capture all the philosophical apparatus, and swing around the telescopes on the swivel, until through them we can see the morning star of the Redeemer, and with mineralogical hammer discover the Rock of Ages, and amid the flora of all realms find the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley. We want some one able to expound the first chapter of Genesis, bring to it the geology and the astronomy of the world, until, as Job suggested, "The stones of the field shall be in league" with the truth, and the stars in their course shall fight against Sisera. Oh, Church of God, go out and recapture these weapons!

Let men of God go out and take possession of the platform. Let any printing presses that have been captured by the enemy be recaptured for God; and the reporters, and the type-setters, and the editors, and the publishers swear allegiance to the Lord God of truth.

Again: I learn from this subject what a large amount of the Church's resources is actually hidden, and buried, and undeveloped. The Bible intimates that that was a very rich land, this land of Israel. It says, "The stones are iron, and out of the hills thou shalt dig brass;" and yet hundreds and thousands of dollars' worth of this metal was kept under the hills. Well, that is the difficulty with the Church of God at this day. Its talent is not developed. If one half of its energy could be brought out, it might take the public iniquities of the day by the throat, and make them bite the dust. If human eloquence were consecrated to the Lord Jesus Christ, it would in a few years persuade this whole earth to surrender to God.

The vast majority of Christians in this day are useless. The most of the Lord's battalion belong to the reserve corps. The most of the crew are asleep in the hammocks. The most of the metal is under the hills. Oh, is it not time for the Church of God to rouse up and understand that we want all the energies, all the talent and all the wealth enlisted for Christ's sake? I like the nickname that the English soldiers gave to Blucher, the commander. They called him "Old Forwards." We have had enough retreats in the Church of Christ; let us have a glorious advance. And I say to you as the general said when his troops were affrighted — rising up in his stirrups, his hair flying in the wind, he lifted up his voice until twenty thousand troops heard him crying out "Forward, the whole line!" We want all the laymen enlisted. Ministers are numerically too small. They do the best they can. They are the most overworked class on earth. It is no more the work of the pulpit to convert and save the world than it is the work of the pew. If men go to ruin, there will be as much blood on your skirts as there will be on mine.

Let us quit this grand farce of trying to save the world by a few clergymen, and let all hands lay hold of the work. Give us, in all our churches, two or three aroused and qualified men and women to help. In most churches to-day five or ten men are compelled to do all the work. A vast majority of churches are at their wits' end how to carry on a prayer-meeting if the minister is not there, when there ought to be enough pent-up energy and religious force to make a meeting go on with such power that the minister would never be missed. Before you and I have the sod pressing our eyelids we will, under God, decide whether our children shall grow up amid the accursed surroundings of vice and shame, or come to an inheritance of righteousness. Long, loud, bitter, will be the curse that scorches our grave if, holding within the Church to-day enough men and women to save the city, we act the coward or the drone.

Again: I learn from this subject that we sometimes do well to take advantage of the world's grindstones. These Israelites were reduced to a file, and so they went over to the garrison of the Philistines to get their axes, and their goads, and their plows sharpened. The Bible distinctly states it—the text which I read at the beginning of the service—that they had no other instruments now with which to do this work, and the Israelites did right when they went over to the Philistines to use their grindstones. My friends, is it not right for us to employ the world's grindstones? If there be art, if there be logic, if there be business faculty on the other side, let us go over and employ it, for Christ's sake. The fact is, we fight with too dull weapons, and we work with too dull implements. We hack and we maul, when we ought to make a clean stroke. Let us go over among sharp business men, and among sharp literary men, and find out what their tact is, and then transfer it to the cause of Christ. If they have science and art, it will do us good to rub against it.

In other words, let us employ the world's grindstones. We will listen to their music, and we will watch their acumen, and we will use their grindstones, and will borrow their philosophical apparatus to make our experiments, and we will borrow their printing presses to publish our Bibles, and we will borrow their rail-trains to carry our Christian literature, and we will borrow their ships to transport our missionaries. That was what made Paul such a master in his day. He not only got all the learning he could get of Dr. Gamaliel, but afterward, standing on Mars Hill, and in crowded thoroughfare, quoted their poetry, and grasped their logic, and wielded their eloquence, and employed their mythology, until Dionysius the Areopagite, learned in the schools of Athens and Heliopolis, went down under his tremendous powers. My friends, we all have tools of Christian power. Do not let them lose their edges. We want no rusty blades in this fight. We want no coulter that cannot rip up the glebe. We want no axe that cannot fell the trees. We want no goad that cannot start the lazy team. Let us get the very best grindstones we can find, though they be in possession of the Philistines.

Again: my subject teaches us on what a small allowance Philistine iniquity puts a man. Yes, these Philistines shut up the mines, and then they took the spears and the swords; then they took the blacksmiths, then they took the grindstones, and they took everything but a file. Oh, that is the way sin works: it grabs everything! It begins with robbery, and ends with robbery. It despoils this faculty and that faculty, and keeps on until the whole nature is gone. Was the man eloquent before, it generally thickens his tongue. Was he fine in personal appearance, it mars his visage. Was he affluent, it sends the sheriff to sell him out. Was he influential, it destroys his popularity. Was he placid, and genial, and loving, it makes him splenetic and cross; and so utterly is he changed that you can see he is sarcastic and rasping, and that the Philistines have left him nothing but a file.

Oh, "the way of the transgressor is hard!" His cup is bitter. His night is dark. His pangs are deep. His end is terrific. Philistine iniquity says to that man: "Now, surrender to me and I will give you all you want—music for the dance, swift steeds for the race, imperial couch to slumber on, and you shall be refreshed with the rarest fruits, in baskets of golden filigree." He lies. The music turns out to be a groan. The fruits burst the rind with rank poison. The filigree is made up of twisted reptiles. The couch is a grave. Small allowance of rest, small allowance of peace, small allowance of comfort. Cold, hard, rough—nothing but a file. Oh, sin has a great facility for making promises; but it has just as great facility for breaking them!

A Christian life is the only cheerful life, while a life of wicked surrender is remorse, ruin, and death. Its painted glee is sepulchral ghastliness. In the brightest days of the Mexican Empire, Montezuma said he felt gnawing at his heart something like a canker. Sin, like a monster wild beast of the forest, sometimes licks all over its victim in order that the victim may be more easily swallowed; but generally sin rasps, and galls, and tears, and upbraids, and files. Is it not so, Herod? Is it not so, Hildebrand? Is it not so, Robespierre? Aye; aye! It is so, it is so. "The way of the wicked he turneth upside down."

History tells us that when Rome was founded, on that day there were twelve vultures flying through the air, but when a transgressor dies the sky is black with whole flocks of them. Vultures! vultures! When I see sin robbing so many, and I see them going down day by day and week by week, I must give a plain warning. I dare not keep it back, lest I risk the salvation of my own soul. Rover, the pirate, pulled down the warning bell on Inchcape Rock, thinking that he would have a chance to despoil vessels that were crushed on the rocks; but one night his own ship crashed down on this very rock and he went down with all his cargo. God declares: "When I say to the wicked thou shalt surely die, and thou givest him not warning, that same man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thy hands."

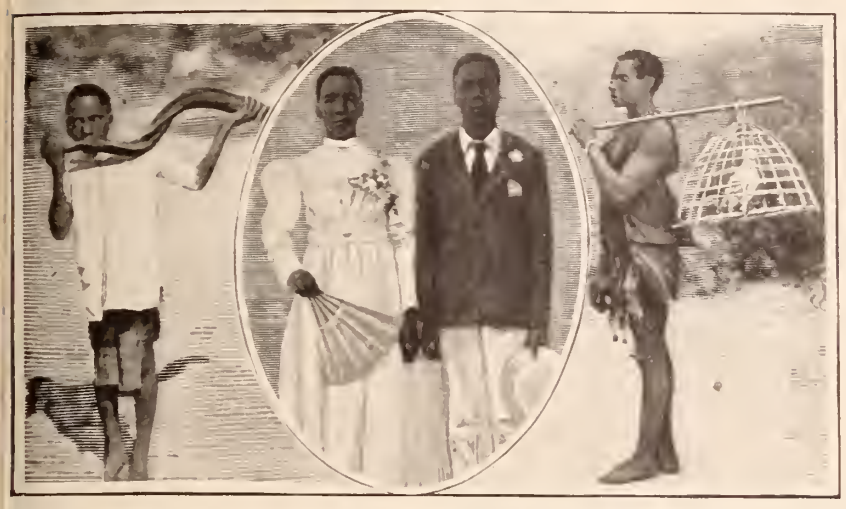
I learn from this subject what a sad thing it is when the Church of God loses its metal! These Philistines saw that if they could only get all the metallic weapons out of the hands of the Israelites, all would be well, and therefore they took the swords and the spears. They did not want them to have a single metallic weapon. When the metal of the Israelites was gone, their strength was gone. This is the trouble with the Church of God to-day. It is surrendering its courage. It has not enough metal. How seldom it is that you see a man taking his position in pew or in pulpit or in a religious society, and holding that position against all oppression, and all trial, and all persecution, and all criticism. The Church of God to-day wants more backbone, more defiance, more consecrated bravery, more metal. How often you see a man start out in some good enterprise, and at the first blast of opposition he has collapsed, and all his courage gone, forgetting the fact that if a man be right, all the opposition of the earth pounding away at him, cannot do him any permanent damage. It is only when a man is wrong that he can be damaged. Why, God is going to vindicate his truth, and he is going to stand by you, my friends, in every effort you make for Christ's cause, the betterment of the world, the advance of righteousness and the salvation of men.

Go forth in the service of Christ, and do your whole duty. You have one sphere, I have another sphere. "The Lord of Hosts is with us, and the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah." We want more of the determination of Jonathan. I do not suppose he was a very wonderful man, but he got on his knees and clambered up the rock, and with the help of his armor-bearer he hewed down the Philistines; and a man of very ordinary intellectual attainments on his knees can storm anything for God, and for the truth. We want something of the determination of the general who went into the war, and as he entered his first battle his knees knocked together, his physical courage not quite up to his moral courage; and he looked down at his knees, and said: "Ah, if you knew where I am going to take you, you would shake worse than that!"

There is only one question for you to ask, and for me to ask, What does God want me to do? Where is the field? Where is the work? Where is the anvil? Where is the prayer-meeting? Where is the pulpit? And, finding out what God wants us to do, go ahead and do it—all the energies of our body, mind and soul enlisted in the undertaking. O, my brethren, we have but little time in which to fight for God! You will be dead soon. Put in the Christian cause every energy that God gives you. "What thy hand findeth to do, do it with all thy might; for there is neither wisdom nor device in the grave," whither we are all hastening. Opportunities of usefulness gone forever; souls that might have been benefited three months ago never again coming under our Christian influence. Oh, is it not high time that we awake out of sleep?

An African Wedding-Feast

Missionary Richards Describes a Leading Social Event at a Tropical Mission—500 Guests Serenade the "Happy Pair"



SOUNDING THE HORN—NATIVE BRIDE AND GROOM—OFF TO THE FOWL MARKET

MANY of our readers will doubtless remember with pleasure the interesting letters from Rev. E. H. Richards, American missionary at Inhambane, East Africa, which have appeared in these columns at intervals during the last few years. Mr. Richards, whose work is conducted under the auspices of the Methodist Missionary Board, is in the centre of a most promising field. In a letter just received he writes that Bishop Hartzell recently paid the mission a brief visit. "Our mail since the Transvaal war began," Mr. Richards adds, "has been meagre and irregular. I suppose it was captured by the Boers, who took it from the railway enroute from Cape Town to Delagoa Bay."

The writer gives a most interesting description of social life at the mission station and in the country round about. For the edification of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers he encloses a number of photographs, several of which are reproduced on this page. Regarding a recent social event of importance he writes:

"It was a native wedding at Makodweni, our most recent wedding, and we are still fresh with particulars. The bride was dressed (an all-important item in this country), in an immaculate suit of common table-cloth stuff, which cost $1.50 per yard. Mrs. Richards made it and wrought a ruffle on it. For three whole days the ladies of our boarding-school admired it, with hands over their mouths, and hearts in their throats. That gown never lacked for admiration. The groom is a 'windfall' to us from the converts at Johannesburg, and of sound Presbyterian faith. He is now a member of our M. E. Church at Makodweni.

"Another photograph shows the writer (the missionary himself) counting 'noses' to discover how to lengthen out five pots of pork and three pots of mutton till they shall have sufficed for five hundred empty and uninvited stomachs, whose owners brought them to the wedding without any bidding at all. All who came were treated as guests, but the amount of meat which each received varied from a thimbleful for the vagrant, all the way up to a gallon or so for the groom. The parties sat on the ground (which was well bared of grass) in groups of so many kraals each, and most of them waited for hours and received but a fragment; but they were there, and at the feast, and helped to eat the three hogs, three sheep, and a hundred fowls.

"After the supper had been eaten, the Christians formed into two bands, and marched about singing, "There is a happy land," and everything else in the hymn book. It was a great improvement on what they would have sung had there been no hymn books. After they had sung the hymns over a few times, they abandoned the words and took up some tune and made up the words as they required them. They made a play that would have done honor to better educated folks, picturing the home, singing:

"'Here's the bridegroom,' 'Here's the palace.'

"'Here's the garden,' 'Here's the washtub.'

"'Here's the breakfast,' 'Here's the baby,' and everything else clear down the whole line. The words appeared natural enough after their manner, and the hymn was only well under way about midnight. It ended near dawn, when all the chief singers were too hoarse to make any perceptible sound. And it was a choice wedding, too.

"Another picture from my kodak shows a specimen of our 'Kaffie' corn. It is tall. The lady is five feet and six inches. The corn is one of the common foods of the land. You will notice that the 'ear' of corn is longer than one's whole arm. This food is often soured (i.e., malted) and made into a regular beer—the curse of the country.

"One of the photographs shows a native going to the fowl-market at the door of the mission station. Their baskets are the common freight car for fowls. The bird is lucky if he has the luxury of this contrivance, for usually he is strung up by the heels over a pole, and carried head downward for half a day in the hot sun. Fowls are selling very dear here now; they are five for a quarter (U. S. currency). They used to be ten for a quarter, but they have risen of late. They may some day attain the price of civilized fowl, but we suspect it will be after our day. Still another figure from my camera shows Dawulela with the horn of a 'Koodoo' calling the boys to work, or school. He is clad in the common mission garb, for despite the cost, we make bold to clothe our children with two garments—one an attempt at a civilized cut, and one the best form of native garment. This covers him for the most part and is as inexpensive as anything that will stick to a boy. He can sound octaves, thirds and fifths on his instrument, and others can play the harp of one string pretty well.

"A sad thought occurs to me about the children here. Many of these little ones would most surely be saved if we could take them into our homes and shut them off for a season from their home inheritances of filth and superstition. As it is, if they live to maturity, it is almost impossible for them to escape the fate of all thoroughbred heathen. What a burden is on the Christian world, and how lightly the burden rests on many of us!

"Our mission home at Kambini is an old but picturesque house, with a large tamarind tree in front and rear, which bears fruit at all seasons. The house is of the common corrugated iron, and suffers but little from the ravages of the ever-present white ant. There are probably one thousand natives within a mile of this house, and the country is full of them.

"One of our elderly men is a chief of one of the important districts in this provience. His son and heir is 'royalty' just as legal, in a way, as that which sits on the throne of England. To how much does 'royalty' amount! This man's knowledge is less abundant than his clothing, his house, or earthly possessions all told, and they are all in sight save a few never cultivated acres of land.

"I am thinking of building a girls seminary, at a cost of $6,000 all told, without furniture. We have a population of some two to three millions of souls, and not a school of any grade. We have only our little home schools in our back parlors. Can the Christians of America find a grander work than helping in this project?"

An Actor and a Preacher

An actor in a Western town, while walking the streets one night and looking for a gambling house, happened to pass a Gospel Mission where they were singing: "Throw Out the Life-Line." He entered, felt the contrast between the warmth and light and joyousness within and between the happy experiences given and the darkness and hopelessness of his own life. Tears gathered in the eyes of the lonely wanderer; he went out with his heart stirred to its very depths. Card-table, barroom, strong drink, had lost in that hour their attraction for him. He wanted the Holy Spirit—the spirit of purity, love, truth and peace—dwelling within his heart and life, and he hungered and thirsted for nothing else so much as this. Soon after, he wandered into another mission, stood up and confessed Jesus as his Master, resigned his position in his company, and faced poverty and want. God opened for him the way to a year's course in a theological seminary, and now he is using the gift of his trained voice in the Master's service.

A Christian Millionaire

Mr. J. M. Cornell speaks to the waifs and outcasts at the Bowery Mission

THE Bowery Mission was recently blessed by a visit from one of New York's most remarkable business men. Mr. J. M. Cornell is not only the head of a firm possessing vast commercial interests, and employing a large number of men, but he is known throughout the

FROM THE AFRICAN KITCHEN GARDEN

Methodist church as one of its most active laymen, and most generous givers. His interest in men is intense. His knowledge of working men, and the many problems that affect their welfare, has rarely been equalled.

When he appeared in the mission, and took his place on the platform, with his two stalwart sons at his side, a very keen interest was aroused in the hearts of the great crowd that was waiting to hear him. Probably the men of the Bowery Mission never listened to a more stirring or successful address than that of this millionaire employer. Mr. Cornell, in his first sentence, put himself on the same level with his hearers. He made them understand how thoroughly he was acquainted with their peculiar needs. There was something manly and noble in the ideal he set before them, and it seemed so gloriously possible, even to the poorest, and weakest, and most distressed. He told them the story of Barney Quin who tried to live a good life, but trusted in his own strength and failed; and the contrasting story of the man who, in utter despair was bent upon suicide, when Mr. Cornell became the providential means of turning him to the Cross, where he was gloriously saved. These were the two parables that formed the basis of the address. Then, in conclusion, Mr. Cornell told that great crowd of homeless men how God loved them, and as the proof of that great fact he reminded them of the giving of "His only Son," and when, in a parenthesis, the speaker, with a quick glance at the two young men at his side, said, "I tell you, boys, if I had to give up my two sons, it would break me all to pieces," there was not a man in the hall who did not feel the truth of the speaker's words.

In the after-meeting, the workers went down the aisles seeking out those who needed help and prayers. Mr. Cornell joined them, and was as industrious as any, and led several poor, weary men to the front. And the story of this rich man coming down on a stormy winter day to meet these poor outcasts, of the loving words he spoke to them, and how he knelt beside the raggedest, and with his arm around them directed them to Christ, has been the talk of the Bowery ever since.

.. Fireside Talks About Jesus ..

Jesus at Jacob's Well

The Talk with the Samaritan Woman

..By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 18th. JOHN 4: 5-26

WHEN Uncle Will had read this story, impressively, at the usual Sabbath evening round table of home Bible study of the cross-roads farmers and their families, he exclaimed: "The most wonderful thing in the world is in this story, the distinguishing characteristic of the Christian faith—God seeking man. Farrar pictures the noblest heathen as 'Seekers after God,' but Jesus tells this lowly woman that 'The Father seeketh such'—seeketh sinful human hearts to love him. That is what seeking worshipers means. Worship is loving God. Incense is but the sign of that, and a mockery if the love arise not from the unseen censer of the heart. Faith is friendship. Bishop Brooks once said: 'It is not God's truth, it is not God's law—it is God that is the salvation of the world—not an instruction, not a commandment, but a Friend.' God seeking men! That is what Jesus was doing as he sat tired and thirsty at the well, not stalking through the earth as a stately divinity, but walking in a lowly humanity straight to the heart's door of the heavy-laden. All theology is here condensed in a living parable: The Father in Christ, who manifests both divinity and humanity in this story, seeking men, not the true nobility of Nicodemus only in proud Jerusalem, but the real serfs of sin at Samaria's well, calling both alike to conversion as the fountain of that eternal life whose river is Christian service, whose ocean is heaven's crystal sea."

Honor All Men "If this story," said Sanders, "glorifies God, no less does it exemplify the command, 'Honor all men.' It shows the value God puts on every human soul. If even the best of his apostles, who were the best quality of humanity then to be found, had been in Christ's place they would have shown threefold contempt to the water-bearer, first, because she was a woman; second, because she was a Samaritan, half foreign in blood; third, because she was immoral. Some who bear the Christian name would have shaded their contempt with the further fact that she was a workwoman.

"The apostles on their return 'marveled that he talked with a woman.' She herself was surprised that a Jew would speak to a Samaritan. And even modern Christians would be surprised to find a talented preacher of to-day talking at all, especially in such a lofty strain, without prejudice or even patronage, to such a sinner."

"To any one sinner for that matter," said Selah Brown, "many a preacher has dismissed a service and saved his sermon; and many a Sabbath School teacher has taught listlessly or not at all, when in bad weather of summer or winter, the audience or class has been reduced to one.

A Great Sermon to One Hearer "A public lecturer, by way of a joke, tells that on one occasion, finding but one person had come to hear him, he addressed him as follows: 'As an individual you may be a success, but as an audience you are a perfect failure.' Instead of saying that to Nicodemus or the woman of Samaria, Christ spoke to them as impressively as when he preached to multitudes, so unconsciously teaching the value of every human soul."

"That reminds me," said Tom Brown, "of a story of Dr. Lyman Beecher who, one stormy, snowy night, preached to but one hearer, who went away before the doctor could speak to him. Twenty years afterwards, in a pleasant village in Central Ohio, a stranger accosted Mr. Beecher, saying: 'Do you remember preaching some twenty years ago, in such a place, to a single person?'

"'Yes, sir,' said the doctor, grasping his hand. 'I do, indeed, and if you are the man, I have been wanting to see you ever since.'

"'I am the man, sir; and that sermon saved my soul—made a minister of me, and yonder is my church. The converts of that sermon are all over Ohio.'"

Mrs. Uncle Will: "Saving one at the well of Samaria led to saving many through her. So it often is even when the one saved is but a child. In Syria, a few years ago, a little barefooted Maronite girl was induced to attend a missionary school by the offer of a pair of shoes. She came a few Sabbaths and was greatly interested. Her parents feared that she would become a Christian, and so forbade her further attendance. But on the Sabbath when she was sent to the well for water, she would stop to rest with her jar of water on her shoulder, within hearing of the singing in the Sabbath School. And so she obtained 'living water.' It was impossible for her non-Christian parents to check the Christian life in her soul. She fled from home, and was educated in the mission school at Beyrout, and has since become the means of leading hundreds of souls to Christ. Do you not recognize in my story the well known, widely beloved Layyah Barakat?"

"What a study of human nature," said Selah Brown, "that woman of Samaria was! When Christ had at once surprised and honored her by asking her to give him to drink, and had told her she could in turn have living water for the asking, how like our unspiritual way of hearing was her reply. 'Thou hast nothing to draw with and the well is deep.' A volume might be written on water as the symbol of the Christ-life in the soul, cleansing from love of sin, satisfying soul thirst, and supplying life power. But many only reply to this ocean of truth, 'Sprinkle me with holy water.' There is no holy water save that of the soul. And then when Jesus read this woman's heart like an open book and saw there a modern French romance in real life with five divorces in her 'tandem polygamy,' how she tried to turn the subject to a sectarian discussion, above which Christ rose instantly, leaving all denominational temples for the upper air where all true worshipers are one in spirit."

"I THAT SPEAK UNTO THEE AM HE"

"At last she got the cleansing water," said Ruth Sanders, the Quakeress, "and then bore it gladly and swiftly to her neighbors.

"Canon Wilberforce says that a Christian's duty is to admit, submit, commit and transmit. 'You admit the truth of Christ, you submit your will to Christ, you commit your soul to Christ, but what do you transmit to others? Let every hearer become a herald. The water of life stagnates if we do not pass it on. A Christian life is not a pond but river and 'everything shall live whithersoever the river runneth.'"

Immortality on Earth "Do not forget," said Mr. Isaacs, "while speaking of doing good, the beautiful suggestion of that saying at the beginning of the lesson, 'Jacob's well was there.' That is but one of many illustrations of the immortality of good men on earth in their influence. Every church, every charity, every noble book or song, every true word and deed, is a well at which long years afterwards Jesus shall drink in the person of some soul influenced to hope and faithfulness."

Mr. Sanders: "In Glasgow stands a beautiful fountain inscribed, 'They being dead yet speak.' Beneath it the names and story of two young men who, in the dark days of persecution in Scotland, were called to yield up their lives for Christ's Crown and Covenant. They were burned at the stake in the very spot where the fountain now stands, but every soul in Scotland drinks the waters of freedom from the well they dug."

Mother Manson: "A very poor and aged man busied in planting and grafting an apple tree, was rudely interrupted by this interrogation: 'Why do you plant trees, who cannot hope to eat the fruit of them?' He raised himself up, and leaning upon his spade, replied: 'Some one planted trees for me before I was born, and I have eaten the fruit. I now plant for others that the memorial of my gratitude may exist when I am dead and gone.'"

Mrs. Uncle Will: "The well I shall tell of is a tapestry picture of this story which brought a Frenchman to the living water. Bible picture rolls are used in our Sabbath Schools which contain large colored pictures to illustrate the current lessons. These pictures are reproduced in miniature and printed on cards to be given to the children to carry home. A special edition of the Bible roll, and the cards is prepared to be used in France. In a Sabbath School in Paris it is the custom to divide the large roll, giving the pictures as prizes at the end of the quarter to the most faithful scholars. A little girl brought home a small card with the picture of Jesus and the woman at the well, with which the father, who was a worker in Gobelin tapestry, was so well pleased that he said: 'If you will be a good girl and get the big picture like this, father will put it into the looms and weave it.' Not a person in the household ever attended church except the Sabbath School girl, but they were all interested in helping her to get the large picture. She did obtain it, and the father began to weave it. While weaving the face of Christ, he was so impressed by its beauty that he became a Christian. Subsequently the other members of the family—the mother and the sisters—also became Christians and joined the church. Another item of interest connected with this bit of tapestry, measuring only about 18 x 14 inches, is the fact that the father of the little girl found himself unable, financially, to complete the weaving. The incident was told Mr. B. F. Jacobs, of Chicago, who sent one hundred and twenty-five dollars to purchase the picture in tapestry, when it should be completed, and it is now in his possession."

Mrs. Brown: "That reminds me of a story of a gentleman stopping at a noted watering-place, who went one morning to one of the springs for a draught of water. While there, a lady came also for a draught of the cooling, sparkling water; the aged Christian turned to her and asked her if she had ever drunk at the Great Fountain. The lady turned and walked away without answering the question. Not many months after, the gentleman was attending a meeting for religious conference and prayer. While there a request came for him to visit a lady in the town, who was dying. As he entered the dying lady's chamber, she fastened her eyes on him, and said with a smile: 'Do you recognize me?' The gentleman was forced to answer in the negative; when the lady said: 'Do you remember asking a lady last spring if she had ever drunk at the Great Fountain?' 'Yes,' said the gentleman, 'I remember that.' 'Well, sir, I am that person. I thought at the time you were very rude, but your words rang in my ears and I was without peace or rest until I found Christ; I now expect to soon pass to my Saviour. I wanted to encourage you by telling you that, under God, you were instrumental in bringing me to Christ. Be faithful to others as you have been to me."

Jesus the Model Teacher Mrs. Uncle Will: "This story is a whole philosophy of teaching in living form.

"1. The small size of Christ's class did not discourage him.

"2. The antipathy of his one scholar did not turn him aside.

"3. The unpromising character of this scholar did not deter him from trying to do her good.

"4. There was no race prejudice in his heart.

"5. He proceeded on the principle of doing good for evil.

"6. Her opposition did not ruffle his patience.

"7. He ignored his own weariness as he put forth effort to do her good.

"8. He set conventionalities aside.

"9. He inspired his pupil with confidence.

"10. He put truth in convincing form.

"11. He aroused in her a desire to reach others with the truth by which she had been impressed.

"12. He cooperated with her in doing good to others."

"Let us close our talk," said Uncle Will, "with the thought of the harvest. There are two kinds of harvests, which may be illustrated by two incidents, which I will now give you:

Two Kinds of Harvests A young man was listlessly strolling through the streets of the village of C——, on a Sabbath evening, and seeing the doors of a church open, he entered, when the preacher was far advanced in his discourse, and quietly took a seat at the back part of the house. The text, as he soon discovered from the sermon, was, "The way of transgressors is hard." And as, at the close of a period, the preacher repeated it, with deep earnestness, he added, "Yes; the way of transgressors is hard, but the end of that way is harder still!"

Like an arrow from the quiver of the Almighty, that last expression entered with power into the young man's soul. As he left the church, those words, "the end of that way is harder still," kept ringing in his ears. They followed him to his dwelling, and went with him to the retirement of his chamber; and for days gave him no rest till he was brought in penitence and faith to the only Saviour of sinners. He soon made a profession of religion; then studied for the ministry; then was ordained pastor of a church; and still lives, at the age of three-score years and ten, to proclaim the gospel of Christ.

Years passed away, when, in a distant city, that young man, now in the full vigor of manhood, was relating this occurrence of his early days, and speaking of the deep impression made upon him by the remark, and the solemn earnestness of the preacher. It was in a little circle of friends where the late excellent Dr. D—— was present; and as the speaker ended the narrative, the former asked:

"Where did you hear that sermon?"

"In the village of C——," was the reply.

"And in what year was it?"

"In the year 18—," said the other.

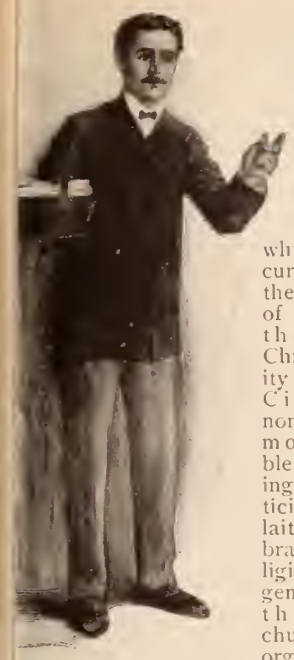
"Then," said Dr. D——, while tears of emotion and thankfulness filled his eyes, "I was the preacher."

"And I," said the other, "was led to Christ and to the ministry by that sermon, and especially by the remark, and the solemn and tender earnestness with which you uttered it, that 'the end is harder still!'"

The Unordained Clergy's Mission

Business Men and Others Who, as Lay Evangelists, Are Doing a Christ-like Work Among New York's Non-Church Going and Neglected Multitudes

(See Illustration on first page)



A YOUNG LAYMAN

OF the many changes which have occurred during the past quarter of a century in the field of Christian activity in New York City, possibly none has been more remarkable or far-reaching than the participation of the laity in various branches of religious effort. A generation ago, the individual church was the organized centre for all efforts along spiritual lines and the pastor the recognized leader. All but a very small fraction of active Christians were connected with one of the half-dozen leading denominations. But the close of the century shows a wholesale multiplication of denominations, independent churches, missions, Christian associations, organizations after the pattern of the Salvation Army, and bodies religious and semi-religious, in which the laity occupies a place of increasing prominence. All this has brought about a great change in methods and organization, as well as an entire readjustment of relations and responsibilities of the clergy and laity.

As against all objections to the participation of laymen in evangelistic effort, the lay preacher finds the strongest Scriptural warrant for the combined secular and sacred service in which he is engaged. From the Apostle Paul to Dwight L. Moody there is an unbroken succession of evangelists taken from the ranks of business men, who have been largely supported by secular occupations while preaching the Gospel.

The Lay Preacher in Business There are many who suppose that those who devote themselves to these forms of evangelistic effort are mainly men of certain eccentricities and uncertain business occupation; but quite the contrary is the case. The great contingent of lay evangelists in New York is composed of many substantial business men, identified with important interests, and a representation of young men of talent and ability in various trades, professions, and positions of trust. There is, of course, a certain proportion of these who in time enter the ordained ministry, or feel led to devote their entire time to some specified field of Christian service. But this proportion is, after all, small and insignificant when compared with the steady accessions to the ranks of the unordained clergy.

It is by no means a reflection on the intelligence of the lay preacher to say that he has little interest in current theological discussion. The great facts of Scripture teaching to him stand out like mountain-tops against the petty mole-hills of controversy. He finds abundant internal evidence attesting the supernatural authority of the Bible; and the daily miracles wrought through these truths in the lives of poor, despairing men and women, answer every question as to its claims. The whole scheme of lay evangelism rests on the basis of an inspired Book which reveals the will of God, and supernatural help for those whose sense of need impels them to trust its promises. The great majority of lay evangelists are most thorough Bible students. Not a few of them have a knowledge of the Greek text, and are otherwise competent to discuss the finest points of exegesis. But it may be said that almost without exception, the conviction obtains that these discussions have no part in this field of ministry.

The parish of the lay preacher is hard to define. In brief, it comprehends all the city which is not included in the parishes of the different churches. The work of the unordained preacher at this point becomes an adjunct to that of his ordained brother, with one important distinction. The ordained preacher is largely compelled to wait for his congregation to find him if they would hear the Gospel; while the genius of lay evangelism lies in carrying the Gospel to the people, wherever they may be found. These congregations gather most largely in the various missions scattered throughout the city, chiefly in thickly populated districts and where a church with ordinary appointments could not be maintained. Then there is the work in the prisons. Twenty-five thousand prisoners pass through the Tombs prison alone every year. There are also a large number of public institutions, such as inebriate asylums, reformatory institutions, hospitals, etc., where the lay preacher is always welcome and where his simple message is regularly delivered to the inmates.

Street Preaching Of the many agencies which have come into prominence within the past few years one of the most effective has been street preaching. The Salvation Army was the pioneer in this field, but it at once appealed to the lay preacher as the only way in which certain classes could be reached. During the past year the Mayor of New York has issued about one hundred and fifty annual licenses for street preaching, and on almost any pleasant evening one may find a dozen or more of these services going on in different portions of the city. At many of these services copies of the New Testament containing marked texts are distributed, and it is remarkable to observe the respectful attention paid to the speakers by audiences often as large as four or five hundred. Another very recent development in methods of reaching the people has been in the direction of midnight missions. There are several of these midnight missions in New York which are largely attended and have proved very successful as agencies for evangelization.

The character of the congregations to which the lay preacher ministers has already been suggested; but it must not be supposed that his labors are solely among the outcasts of society. It is doubtless true that, in the majority of cases, there is a more ready response to the Gospel invitation by those who have reached the lowest depths of misery; but there is a sprinkling of honest, industrious working people in the sphere of these activities. The lay preacher meets his congregation in the simple surroundings of a mission, where they feel at ease.

There is an unconscious testimony in the efforts of a business man along the line of evangelism; and his listeners in some way feel a bond of sympathy in the thought that the one who is addressing them shares their common experience in his contact with the hard problems of actual life. From the very nature of the case, the lay evangelist is brought into close relation with his congregation. With him, revival effort must be constant—not occasional. Every service is one of earnest exhortation to definite decision. This leads to both public and personal appeals, and commonly to personal prayer with each of those manifesting a desire to lead a Christian life. So the lay preacher kneels at some rude altar, arm in arm with the drunkard, the criminal, and poor outcasts of every description, to direct them to the one source of adequate help.

Characteristic Testimonies The testimony of the mission convert is intensely practical. He tells of the actual difference in his life, and how he is enabled to triumph in the trials and temptations which he meets from day to day. A convert told, at a mission service, how he confessed to his employer certain dishonest acts committed before conversion. His fellow employees were indirectly implicated, and sought in every way to injure him. But the plots were made to turn on the conspirators, and the convert was greatly encouraged. The man's wife arose in the meeting, and after telling of the complete change wrought in their home, added, "Why, even our beer pitcher was converted; it became a coffee-pot."

Another: a man past middle life, told how drink had brought him to the gutter. After the last cent was gone, the desperate craving for drink led himself and a companion to theft. With the proceeds of the theft they purchased several gallons of wood alcohol, thinking it would satisfy the craving for drink, and at the same time prove an effective means of suicide. The speaker said his mind was a blank for three months, until, when his senses returned, he found himself in a padded cell in the insane pavilion of Bellevue Hospital. He was released from the hospital a physical wreck, but a few days later found himself in a mission near the Bowery, where he began the new life in which he is now rejoicing.

Men constantly testify to having entered missions strongly under the influence of liquor, and have been sobered while they knelt at the penitent altar, from which they arose to remain sober evermore.

The Lay Preacher and Philanthropy The lay preacher recognizes the field of pure philanthropy to be distinct from that of evangelism. Indeed, in his experience, philanthropy becomes but the handmaid of evangelistic effort. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is ever set forth as the supreme attraction rather than free beds or meal tickets. Emphasis is placed on the practical aspect of the Gospel which presents the availability of Divine help rather than the help of man. It has been found that little progress is made in the direction of a spiritual change until men are willing to look beyond the loaves and fishes, and exercise a measure of faith for temporal as well as spiritual needs. It is the invariable experience that when men accept the Gospel invitation in this spirit, the necessity for pecuniary assistance ceases.

The portion of New York City below Fourteenth street is the chief field of mission effort, and comprises a population of 642,592, according to the last census. Of this number there are 32,074 Protestant church members, a trifle more than five per cent. of the population.

HON. JOHN P. FAURE (A LAY WORKER)

This leaves a balance of 592,518 as material for missionary effort, or considerably more than the combined populations of three great heathen cities, Rangoon, Burmah; Hong Kong, China; and Yokahoma, Japan. In some thickly populated districts the percentage of Protestant church members is less than one per cent. of the population, and in the entire district there are 170,000 children not attending Sunday School. In this great field there are 78 Protestant churches of all kinds, the combined seating capacity of which would not accommodate the five per cent. of church members referred to.

On a Sunday morning, not long ago, a strange sight was witnessed in the central department of the Tombs prison. The prisoners are not allowed to leave their cells for public worship, and the services are conducted in the great corridor on a platform in the centre of the second tier. As the evangelist speaks, his voice echoes down the long area and not one of his auditors is seen. At intervals a pair of eyes or a portion of the face of an eager listener may be seen through the grated door of one of the cells which rise in monotonous tiers on either hand. On this Sunday, after a most impressive service, the invitation was given to any of the prisoners who desired to become Christians to manifest it by the raised hand. And all along these tiers of cells hands could be seen outstretched through the iron bars, desiring to take by faith the Hand that was pierced for them.

As the lay preacher pursues his ministry in these highways and hedges of sin, he finds on every side the hands of captive souls outstretched for the truth. And the power of the Gospel in these lives, and the inward joy of this holy service, are his exceeding great reward.

Putting Oneself in Another's Place

THERE are people who think the only way to meet social obligations is, literally, to put oneself into the place of the person with whom you sympathize. For example, a minister sees suffering and degradation among the poorer classes. What does he do? Well, he dons a workman's garb, and hires himself out to a contract carpenter, or a contract mason; or he goes to the iron foundry and gets work for a week. It is like the eyes trying to perform the functions of the hand; the ears trying to perform the functions of the foot. In one sense, we cannot put ourselves into the place of another; in another sense, we can. Our Elder Brother has taught us how to do it. It is not by surrendering differences of station and function. It is by standing in the calling wherein we are called, and showing sympathy and extending help to those who need our sympathy and help. The eye can see, but it cannot hear. The ear can hear, but it cannot see.

The minister who thinks one week of hard work will bring him to the same plane, or reveal to him the same experiences with the working man, is a very superficial man. He will encounter hardships of hand and muscle and limb, for which the laborer cares nothing at all. Socially, he cannot feel as the laboring man. What is it to the man with the hoe that all day long he beats the clod to break it? He is better every way for this employment than he would be without it. It keeps his appetite good, his digestion good. "The sleep of the laboring man is sweet, whether he eats little or much." He meets a function of society, in itself just as important as any other. "If he is faithful to that which is least, he is faithful also in much." Let him take pride in what he is.

In the same manner, if the minister shall try the rich man's outward lot, he could not feel as the rich man feels. The minister stands in the church to preach the Gospel to the rich and poor together, while they recognize that God is the Maker of them all. He goes about among men to comfort and encourage them in their differences; to persuade them to feel for each other; to help one another in their differences. The function of the eye is, perhaps, more dignified than that of any other organ. As an organ, it is more wonderful than any other. But it is no more useful than the foot is. It is the foot that helps man into the posture that is above that of the brute; helps him to look up to God. It is the foot that is the original locomotive, automobile. All the great pilgrimages of mankind have been taken on foot. It is the foot-soldier that carries the conquests of civilization from land to land. You may destroy fortifications, ships of war, the great guns, that belch out mingled flame and thunder, but if the man on foot escapes you, you will have to do it all over again.

The Ruins of Karnak

THESE ruins have been so long untouched by time, that it causes unusual emotion, to be told that an earthquake shock has prostrated eleven of its wonderful columns, and shattered the architraves that crowned them. The whole world has an interest in the preservation of these venerable relics. Emerson has said:

Earth proudly wears the Parthenon,
As the best gem upon her zone,
And morning opes with haste her lids
To gaze upon the pyramids.
O'er England's abbeys bend the sky,
As on its friends, with kindred eye,
For out of thought's interior sphere
These wonders rose to upper air;
And nature gladly gave them place,
Adopted them into her race,
And granted them an equal date
With Andes and with Ararat.

So, to miss any of these architectural wonders is a loss to all earth's inhabitants. Once, we had only poor engravings of such magnificent ruins; now we have the most elegant photographs. We remember the thrill which came over us, as on our route to Rome, we saw from the car window, the real leaning-tower of Pisa. That displaced forever the woodcut in our childhood's geography. Next to actual vision of such structures is a good photograph; and having seen the photograph, is next to having seen the thing. So that we come to feel a personal interest and possession respecting it; and grieve over its loss. We remember the grief that followed the falling of Table Rock, Niagara Falls. We had stood upon it, but, now it is gone forever. So, we grieve over the ruins of Karnak.

Fixing Up the Bible

WE have no sympathy with those who are trying to mend the Scriptures, subtracting here and adding there and interpolating somewhere else. We not only believe in the Bible, but in the Bible in its present shape. The mightiest damage done to the Scriptures has been done by critics calling themselves Christians. They have excited suspicion against the entire Book while overhauling this and that Epistle, this and that chapter. It is too late to remodel the Bible. You might as well take hold of your father's last will and testament and after its bequests have been paid to the heirs, go into criticism of its chirography, its spelling and its grammar. You might as well go to the old picture-galleries in Dresden and in Venice and in Rome, and expurgate the old paintings. Perhaps you could find a foot of Michael Angelo's "Last Judgment" that might be improved. Perhaps you could throw more expression into Raphael's "Madonna." Perhaps you could put more pathos into Rubens' "Descent from the Cross." Perhaps you could change the crests of the waves in Turner's "Slave Ship." Perhaps you might go into the old galleries of sculpture and change the forms and the posture of the the statues of Phidias and Praxiteles. Such an iconoclast would very soon find himself in the penitentiary. But it is worse vandalism when a man proposes to refashion these masterpieces of inspiration and to remodel the moral giants of this gallery of God.

Now let us divide off. Let those people who do not believe the Bible and who are critical of this and that part of it, go clear over to the other side. Let them stand behind the devil's guns. There can be no compromise between infidelity and Christianity. Give us the out and out opposition of infidelity rather than the work of these hybrid theologians, these mongrel ecclesiastics, these half and half evoluted pulpiteers who believe the Bible and do not believe it, who accept the miracles and do not accept them, who believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures and do not believe in the inspiration of the Scriptures—trimming their belief on one side to suit the scepticism of the world, trimming their belief on the other side to suit the pride of their own heart—and feeling that in order to demonstrate their courage they must make the Bible a target, and shoot at God.

An Unnecessary Agitation

"All preaching of righteousness is, to some, unnecessary agitation."

UNDER this heading the Mormon organ, the News, of Salt Lake City, quotes from an Eastern paper as follows, deprecating the consideration by the public of the adoption of a Constitutional Amendment prohibiting Polygamy: "We find it difficult to believe that such an amendment is necessary. It certainly ought not to be in this stage of American civilization. It is not flattering to the pride of our people to be obliged to acknowledge the necessity of adopting this method of stamping out a reproach to any civilization in the closing days of the nineteenth century, and we think, in view of the apparently conceded fact that Polygamy is dying out of itself, that there should be serious deliberation before taking that step. The men who made our National Constitution were averse to recognizing slavery by name in it, and there would be a propriety in their successors taking the same attitude toward the other twin relic of barbarism."

This objection to agitation suits the Mormon organ. It haunts the press for every word which can be construed into favoring their doing as they please. This doing as the evil minded please is a sure way to increase wickedness; they want to be let alone in doing wrong.

Evil doing deprecates the light. The thief fears the street lamp. A deceiver deplores detection. Christianity is the light of the world; sin is alarmed at its approach. The Christian press does a great duty in warning the innocent against the dark ways of sin. I rejoice that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD endeavors to do its whole duty in warning its readers against the dissemination of polygamous doctrines. The adoption of an amendment to our Constitution would be a great step towards the protection of the home. The News, the Mormon organ, tries to deceive the public by claiming that their so-called Church is not responsible for the election of a polygamist to Congress, but the intensity of its defense of Mr. Roberts, at every turn, proves what its words deny. (He has since been rejected by Congress.)

It should constantly be kept in mind that the adoption of a Constitutional amendment will take time, and the public attention must be held to it until it is completed. The ratification of "the Conventions" of nine of the "Thirteen Original States," established the original Constitution. It provides for its amendment in two ways. In one, which is the usual way, 1st: Both Houses of Congress prepare and pass the amendment by a two-thirds vote. 2nd: This action of Congress is formally communicated to each State and must be considered by the Legislature of each State and when it has been ratified by the Legislature of three-fourths of the State, the amendment is proclaimed as duly adopted, and is "valid as a part of the Constitution."

This, it will be seen, not only takes time, but requires a strong sentiment in its favor. JOHN EATON.

Aunt Samantha's Trip

INTEREST in Aunt Samantha's Trip Around the World is rapidly increasing, and we are receiving letters from some of our readers whose subscription began subsequent to the commencement of the story, inquiring whether we could supply them with back numbers and thus enable them to start from the beginning. Others again, who have been subscribers for many years but who thought that they would not be interested in Aunt Samantha's journeyings and who have now changed their minds, would also like to have the back numbers which they failed to preserve. In order to meet this demand, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is prepared to send to all who may desire them, the first eight instalments of Aunt Samantha's Tour of the World, on receipt of three two cent stamps. This will afford tens of thousands an opportunity to become interested in one of the most charming, most helpful and most fascinating reform stories of the present day.

BRIEF NOTES

There are Christian Endeavorers in both the armies now in conflict in South Africa.

Col. H. H. Hadley has resigned his office as lay director of the Church Army, and his resignation has been accepted.

A marked improvement in Sunday closing has been observed of late in Chicago. On the last three Sundays the majority of the grocery and meat stores have been closed all day.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding successful meetings at Charleston, S. C. The Old Circular Church was filled at each service, and there have been numerous accessions to the churches.

In reply to many inquiries, we state again that the Bible Class conducted in New York by Rev. D. M. Stearns meets in the Madison Avenue Reformed Church every Monday at two o'clock.

The classification of medical missionaries now in the field made by the Missionary Review shows that of the 680 medical missionaries, of whom 210 are women, the Presbyterians, North, send 83, the Methodists 29, the Baptists also 29, the American Board 27.

The Church Missionary Society now has 867 missionaries in the field, of whom 520 are men and 347 are women. Of these, 489 are wholly or partially supported from resources outside of the society, some living on their own incomes and the others supported by churches or individuals.

Two grandsons of Li Hung Chang have come to the United States for study. They will enter Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., after a preparatory course under the superintendence of Dr. Walter Lambuth, formerly missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Soo Chow.

Surgeon John V. Hamilton, U. S. A., who died at Matanzas after a brief sickness, was a direct lineal descendant of Alexander Hamilton, the famous statesman. He was a remarkably able physician and a man of fine Christian character. His wife was with him through all his work in Cuba.

Revival services in Brooklyn, N. Y., were held every day last week in the Y. M. C. A. hall. So large was the audience on Jan. 21, that it was necessary to hold an overflow meeting. Drs. Gregg, A. C. Dixon, Len. G. Broughton and A. T. Pierson are conducting the meetings, aided by other preachers.

The Statistics of the Reformed Dutch Church published in the Independent recently are liable to give an erroneous impression, which we are asked to correct. In the list published in that journal in January, 1899, the number of foreign communicants was included, In the list published this year, only the American communicants are given. The number of American communicants is 109,361, an increase for the year of 856.

The First Evangelical Lutheran Church of San Juan, Porto Rico, has been organized in that city. It will be affiliated with the General Council of the Lutheran Church of North America. The principal movers in the new organization are Rev. M. Swensson, Rev. H. F. Richards and Rev. F. B. Hankey. A Church Council has been appointed with Mr. Erik R. Koltiff as secretary. The new organization promises to be very active in missionary work in our new colony.

The Second Avenue Baptist Church at 164 Second avenue, New York, has established a Fruit and Flower Mission. Its object is to supply flowers, fruits and delicacies to the sick poor on the east side of the city. Donations of jellies, fresh eggs, condensed milk, etc., would be acceptable. They should be addressed to Mrs. W. L. Elseffer, the General Secretary. Trained workers from the missions have undertaken to distribute articles sent to the mission to the sick poor.

In reply to an inquiry on the subject of temperance addressed to the superintendents of almshouses in various sections of the United States answers have been given by 816. Averaging the results obtained, it appears that the number of persons now being supported in these institutions, who were brought to poverty by indulgence in intoxicating liquors is more than one-half of the whole number. If the same ratio applies in all the almshouses of the United States, it is estimated that about one million and a half persons have been thrown on public support by the liquor traffic.

Desperate Fighting

CONFLICTING accounts of a fierce battle in South Africa on Jan. 24 have come from British and Boer sources. So far as can be learned from the dispatches, it would appear that Gen. Warren, finding it impossible to proceed with his attempt to turn the Boer flank, made an assault on Spion Kop, a steep hill, which was the key to the Boer position. He succeeded, during Tuesday night, in reaching the summit and driving the Boers from their trenches; but apparently had not been able to drag his heavy guns up the hill. When the sun rose, he found, to his consternation, that the Boers had Krupp, Creusot and Maxim guns mounted on other heights, which commanded the top of Spion Kop. All day long he was subjected to a heavy fire, to which he could not reply and had to sustain the assault of the Boers who advanced, covered by the guns. When darkness fell, he decided to abandon the position he had gained at such fearful loss. It was evidently untenable and when Gen. Buller visited his camp, he refused to allow a second attempt to seize it to be made. Realizing that the repulse meant the failure of the plan of campaign and that it was impossible to reach Ladysmith by that route, General Buller retreated to the south side of the Tugela River. The retreat was made in good order and was unopposed by the Boers. Whether a new attempt to relieve the garrison at Ladysmith will be made by another route, or whether it will be left to its fate, is not stated. The blunder of assaulting a position which could not be held after it was won, is all the more astonishing because General Warren was believed to have a thorough knowledge of the country and to be familiar with Boer tactics. He is one of the finest officers in the British service, a pious man whose character resembles that of the heroic Gordon, and a man of undoubted valor. The ease with which the ablest generals in the British army have been out-manœuvered in this war, gives color to the suspicion that they are opposed by the best European strategists. England was warned at the beginning of the war, that she was so bitterly hated abroad, that whenever she engaged in a conflict in which her fleet would be powerless, she would have to meet her foes from every land, who were envious of her greatness. The warning appears to have been well grounded. The joy manifested in France, Germany, Russia and other lands over the humiliation she is enduring, recalls the words of the Psalmist:

GEN. SIR CHAS. WARREN

Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbors, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us (Ps. 44:13).

Dan[illegible]n High Altitudes

[illegible]ian writing in a medical jour[illegible]s other practitioners on the danger of allowing patients to go to health resorts in the mountains. "The experiment," he says, "is especially dangerous where the patient has any disease of the heart, or has a weak heart. It is especially the rapidity of the change from one altitude to another, with differences of from three to four thousand feet, which must be considered. There is a call made on the contractibility of the small arteries on the one hand, and on the amount of muscular force of the heart on the other hand, and if the structures in question cannot respond to this call, rupture of an artery or dilation of the heart may ensue. In the case of a normal condition of the circulatory organs little harm is done beyond some transient discomfort, such as dizziness, buzzing in the ears, palpitation, general 'malaise,' and this often only in the case of people totally unaccustomed to high altitudes." The physician cites several instances of death occurring through the removal of patients to higher ground. Happily there is no such danger in the condition of the soul.

If ye then be risen with Christ seek those things which are above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God (Col. 3:1).

Use of a Cork Safe

A New Orleans journal publishes a description of an ingenious device to prevent the victims of fraud from detecting the criminals who have swindled them. It consists of imitation office furniture, which can be easily and rapidiy transformed. When the victim was lured into the room occupied by the plotters, he saw roller-top desks, an office railing, a handsome cabinet and, in the corner of the room, a large and apparently burglar-proof safe. The last was six feet high and looked like the real thing. Every detail—combination, knob, hinges, bolt-heads, lettering, etc.—was complete. But it was really made of cork covered with paper. When the victim discovered that he had been cheated, he would come back, but the furniture could be so changed in his absence that he would not recognize the room. The safe would be folded together and put in a closet, a roller-top desk proved to be a folding bed; the cabinet became a wash-stand and the office-railing was hidden in sections under the flooring. The room was to all appearance an ordinary sleeping-apartment, and the victim would declare that it was not there that he had parted with his money. It was a crafty scheme, but it failed, and the police took possession of the furniture.

A RED CROSS AMBULANCE HOSPITAL ON THE BATTLEFIELD

A similar failure awaits the men who while given over to evil, masquerade as men of innocence and piety. Though they are skilful in transforming themselves, God will surely expose them:

He disappointeth the devices of the crafty so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise (Job 5:12)

A Lineman's Oversight

An accidental touch of an electric light wire in New York caused the death of an experienced employee of the Manhattan Company, a few days ago. One of the most dangerous duties involved in the company's service, is that known as "trouble hunting." It consists in making tests of the system with a view of locating possible breaks in the circuits. Only the most careful and reliable workmen are employed in this duty. One of these started out with a helper to examine the wires in Fourteenth street. He had worked along the street as far as Ninth avenue, making tests at intervals. At the corner of the avenue he climbed the pole, while his helper stood below with the tools. The helper was looking down the avenue when he heard a heavy thud. Turning around, he saw the lineman lying prostrate on the sidewalk. He went to his assistance immediately, but the man was dead. A black streak across one of his hands showed where he had taken hold of the wire. In his pocket were the rubber gloves that he usually wore when engaged in this duty. Apparently he had forgotten to put them on. If he had been wearing them, the inspectors say, he might have handled the wire with impunity. It seems strange that a man so experienced should have neglected the simple precaution; but familiarity with danger often leads to such neglect. In spiritual matters the men whom it is the hardest to win for Christ are those who have been familiar with Gospel truth from childhood, but have not applied it to their own hearts and lives.

Do not ye after their works: for they say and do not (Matt. 23: 3).

Suing for Reward

A novel suit has been tried at Kokomo, Ind. It was brought by a man who had saved the life of a lady some months before. She, with her husband, a wealthy farmer, was crossing a bridge during a flood, when the structure collapsed and they fell into the river. The farmer was able to swim to the bank, but his wife was carried down the stream. Her course, however, was arrested by a tree, in the branches of which her skirts became entangled. Her situation was full of peril and her husband ran along the shore in great distress, calling for help and offering a thousand dollars for her rescue. A man who heard the offer ventured out and brought the lady ashore. He demanded the reward, but the husband demurred. He said he had made the offer under temporary excitement and it was much too large a sum to pay for the service rendered. A jury, however, after hearing the case, determined otherwise and gave the rescuer the amount offered by the husband. The decision was just. A promise so made ought to be kept; but how many are broken! How few there are who fulfil the pledges made on a sick-bed or under the dread of some impending calamity!

Dynastic Trouble in China

The edict issued in Pekin by the Emperor, Kuang-Su, has excited apprehensions among the foreign population of China, which appear to be only too well grounded. The edict, which purports to be signed by the Emperor, announces his abdication and appoints his successor. No one supposes that this is a voluntary act on his part. It is believed that the Empress Dowager has forced the young man to issue it. A report is current that he has committed suicide, but the prevalent opinion is that, if he is dead, he has been murdered by order of his unscrupulous relative. Such an event has been expected ever since, fifteen months ago, he resigned his power and made the Empress Dowager supreme ruler of the empire. His reign has been a short one. He was placed on the throne in 1875, but, as he was then only four years old, the government was administered by a regency, of which the Empress Dowager, Tsze Chi, was chief member. On his coming of age he showed an enlightened disposition to govern in accord with western ideas and resented all attempts to control him. Tsze Chi, however, had been so long in power that she had numerous powerful friends, who combined with her to set the young Emperor aside. She reversed his policy and dismissed the officers he had appointed. Since that time he has been a cipher in the government and has lived in retirement. The new Emperor named in the edict is Pu-chun, a boy fourteen years old, whose minority will give the Empress Dowager an extension of her lease of power. Pu-chun is a son of Prince Tuan, the chief of the famous anti-foreign society, known as "The Boxers," who are suspected of having instigated the recent murders of missionaries. His appointment is ominous, not only of trouble for foreign residents, but for the future decay of China, as he has from infancy been under the control of men noted for their opposition to progress and reform. There is reason to fear that the empire will have renewed cause to endorse the Preacher's warning:

"Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child" (Eccles. 10:16).

ARVILLY deserted from the army and gloried in it, she said bein' a woman born, she had never had a right, and now she took it. After her husband wuz buried, and her hull life too, she thought for a spell, she deserted, but bein' ketched and court-martialed, she appeared before the officers in her own skirt and bask waist and dared 'em touch her. Waitstill Webb, the young sweetheart of the man that shot her husband, wuz with her. Good land! Arvilly didn't lay up nothin' aginst her or him; he wuz drunk as a fool when he fired the shot. He didn't know what he wuz doin'; he wuz made irresponsible by the law, till he did the deed, and then made responsible by the same law and shot. Waitstill wuz named from a Puritan great, great, aunt, whose beauty and goodness had fell onto her, poor girl! She stood by Arvilly. They wuz made friends on that dretful night when they had stood by the men they loved, one killed and the other to be killed by the govermunt. Poor things! they wuz bein' protected, I spoze our govermunt would call it; it always talks a good deal about protectin' wimmen; 'tennyrate the mantilly of the law hung over 'em both and shaded 'em, one man layin' dead, shot through the heart, the other condemned to be shot, both on 'em by legal enactments, both men not knowin' or meanin' any more harm than my Josiah up in Jonesville if he had been sot fire to by law and then hung by law because he smoked and blistered. Good land! them that sets a fire knows that there has got to be smoke and blisters, good land! there must.

The officers they wuz just dumb-foundered at the sight of a woman with a bask waist on in that position—a bein' court-martialed for desertion—and her speech dumb-foundered 'em still more, so I spoze; I hearn it from one who wuz there.

Arvilly and the Court-Martial

Sez Arvilly to 'em, and they wuz drew up in battle array as you may say, dressed up in uniform and quite a few on 'em, the stars and stripes behind 'em, and the mantilly of the law drapin' 'em in heavy folds. And I don't spoze that through her hull life Arvilly wuz ever so eloquent as on that occasion. All her powers of mind and heart wuz electrified by the dretful shock and agony she had underwent, and her words fell like a hard storm of lightenin' and hail out of a sky when it is just stored full of electrical power and has got to bust out.

Sez Arvilly: "You men represent the force and power of the govermunt that falsely sez it is the voice of the people; we two represent the people. As you are the force and power and will of the law, we are the endurance, the suffering. You decide on a war. When did a woman ever have any voice in saying that there should be a war? They bear the sons in agony that you call out to be butchered; their hearts are torn out of their bosoms when they let their husbands, sons and lovers go into the hell of warfare, and you tax all her property to raise money to help furnish the deadly weapons that kill and cut to pieces the warm, living, loving forms that they would give their lives for.

"But you men decide on a war, as you have on this. You say that it wuz from motives of philanthropy and justice; you drag us, the people, out of peaceful, happy homes to leave all we love, to face mutilation, agony and death: you say your cause wuz just, I say it is a lie. I say it is a war of revenge—a war of conquest."

(The idee of Arvilly tellin' the govermunt it lied; why it fairly made goose pimples run over me when I hearn on't. Sassin' the govermunt, she wuz—nothin' more nor less. But she went on worse than ever.

"SASSIN' THE GOVERMUNT SHE WUZ—NOTHIN' MORE NOR LESS"

"You say that it wuz to give freedom to the people of Cuba. You hypocrite! Look at the millions of your own wimmen enslaved in legal fetters! You say that it wuz to protect the wimmen and children of Cuba from the cruelty and brutality of unscrupulous rulers. You hypocrite and liar! Look at the wimmen and children of your own country cowering and hiding from crazed drunken husbands, sons and fathers. More misery, murder, suicides, abuse and suffering of every kind is caused by the saloon every day of the year in the United States than ever took place in Cuba in twice the same time, and you not only stand by and see it, but you take pay from the butchers for slaughtering the innocents! You miserable hypocrites, you!" Sez Arvilly, "I would talk about pity and mercy, you that know no pity and no mercy for your own wimmen and children.

A Crime Against Manhood

"You pose before foreign nations as a reformer, a righter of wrongs, when you have cherished and are cherishing now the most gigantic crime and wrong that ever burdened a people; turning a deaf ear to the burdened and dying about you; wives, mothers, daughters—for whose safety and well-being you are responsible—have told you that the saloon killed all the manhood and nobility of their husbands, sons, and fathers; made the pure, good men, who loved and protected them, into cold-hearted brutes and demons who turn and rend them—still you would not hear. You have seen the dretful procession of sixty thousand funerals pass before you every year, slain by this foe that you pamper and protect.

The Saloon Blocks the Way

"Lovers of good laws have told you that the saloon blocked up the way to every reform and wuz the greatest curse of the day; still you threw your mighty protection around the system and helped it on. The most eminent doctors have told you that drunkenness ruined the bodies of men; Christian clergymen told you that it ruined their souls, and that the saloon was the greatest enemy that the Church of Christ had to contend with to-day; that when by its efforts and sacrifices it saved one soul from ruin, the saloon ruined two to fill the place of that one who wuz saved, and still you opholded it.

"Petitions signed by hundreds of thousands of the best people of the land have been sent to you, but these petitions, weighted down with the tears and prayers of these people have been made a jest and a mock of by you. And strangest, most awful of sights—incredible almost to men and angels—this govermunt, that sot out as a reformer to Christianize Cuba and the Philippines have planted there this heaviest artillery of Satan, the saloon, to bind the poor islanders in worse bondage and misery than they ever dremp on. Hain't you ashamed of yourself! You fool, you! You fool and villain!" (Oh! dear me! Oh, dear suz! To think on't; Arvilly wuz talkin' to the govermunt, and callin' it a fool and villain! The idee! Why, it wuz enough to skair anybody most to death!) I spoze it made a great adoo. I spoze that the men who represented the govermunt wuz too horrified to make a reply. Arvilly always did go too fu when she got to goin'. But it can't h denied that she had great reason for he feelin's, for the strongest argument wu still to come. I spoze she got almost ca ried away by her own talk and feelin'; for all of a sudden they said she lifte her long bony hand and arm—Arvilly a ways wuz kinder spare in flesh—she lifte up her arm and her bony forefinge seemed to be follerin' the lines of som words writ up there on the wall, sez sh slowly, in a awful voice:

"My country! thou are weighed in th balance and found wanting!"

It wuz a thrillin' moment, but after minute's silence she went on: "Look a me!" sez she, pintin that same forefinge first at herself and then at th tall veiled figger of the youn girl beside her—"Look at us we, the people, represent to yo another of your favorite reforms the Canteen, that product o civilization and Christianity yo have transplanted from our hol shores to the benighted tropics How many petitions have yo had wet with the tears of wive and mothers, weighted dow with their prayers to close thi gateway to hell. But no, for a price, as Judas sold his Lord, you have trafficked in humar souls and will do so. And yo are the power—you control; we are the people—we suffer. We leave all we love, we go out and fight your battles when you tel us to, we face mutilation and death for you — isn't that enough? No; besides the foe in front you set us aginst, you introduce a foe into our midst that is a million times as fatal and remorseless. The foe in front only aims at our bodies; this foe, before it kills our bodies, kills all honor, all manhood, all that is noble and worthy to be loved—a devilish foe indeed, but by your command it is let loose upon us; we are the people, we must endure it. Look at me!" agin she pinted that bony forefinger at herself, "I had a husband I loved as well as the gracious lady in the White House loves her husband. He wuz a good man. He thought he owed a duty to his country. He went to fight her battles at her call. He might have escaped Spanish bullets, but not this foe his Christian govermunt set aginst him. In a low Canteen, a vile drinking den, rented by you for the overthrow of men's souls and bodies, in a drunken brawl a bullet aimed by a crazed brain for another poor ruined boy, reached my husband's faithful heart, faithful to the country that slew him, not for patriotism or honor, but for a few pennies of money—not even the thirty pieces of silver Judas earnt for betraying his Lord. This bullet wuz sent from the hand of a young man, a college graduate, one of the noblest, brightest and best of men until this foe our govermunt set for him vanquished him. He got into a quarrel with another drunken youth, another victim of the Canteen, and meant to shoot him but the unsteady hand sent it into the heart of my husband who went into that vile place thinkin' that he could appease the quarrel. This young man was shot for your crime and here is his widow," and turning to Waitstill, she said, "Lift up your veil; let them look upon us, the people."

THE TAX COLLECTOR

"DAY BY DAY WE SAILED"

The Unveiling of Waitstill

The young girl drew back her vail and a face of almost perfect beauty wuz disclosed, but white as death. The big dark eyes were full of sorrow and despair, sadder than tears. She simply said:

"I loved him—he was murdered—I have come to denounce his murderers."

Her voice wuz low, but the words fell like drops of blood, so vivid, so full were they of the soul of her being.

"Yes," sez Arvilly, "and you are his murderer: Not the Spaniards, not the foe of this govermunt that the poor young fellow tried with a boy's warm-hearted patriotism to save. You murdered him." She turned to let her companion speak agin, but the power to speak had gone from her; her slender figure swayed and Arvilly caught her in her strong arms. She had fainted almost away; she could say no more. But what more could she say to this govermunt.

"He was murdered—I loved him—I have come to denounce his murderers."

Arvilly helped Waitstill down on a bench where she leaned back still and white most as if she wuz dead. But before Arvilly went out with Waitstill leanin' on her arm, she turned and faced them dumb-foundered men once more:

"Who is accountable for the death of her lover?" pintin' to the frail, droopin' figger. "Who is accountable for the death of my husband? Who is accountable for the death and everlastin' ruin of my son, my husband, my father and my lover? sez the millions of weepin' wimmen in America that the Canteen and the saloon have killed and ruined. These questions unanswered by you are echoin' through the hull country demandin' an answer. They sweep up aginst the hull framework of human laws made professedly to protect the people, aginst every voter in the land, aginst the rulers in Washington, D. C., aginst the Church of Christ—failing to git an answer from them they sweep up to God's throne. There they will git a reply." Sez Arvilly: "Woe! woe! to you rulers who deviseth iniquity to overthrow the people committed to your care."

Arvilly then went out leadin' Waitstill, and when she come back to Jonesville she [illegible] with her, a patient mourner, [illegible] body and goin' out to day's [illegible] Seventy-five cents a day, for she [illegible] her way to live, for she wuzn't [illegible] then to go on with her nursing and she hadn't a relation on earth, and the man our govermunt murdered in that Canteen represented all there wuz on this broad earth for her to love. They worshiped each other and Waitstill is waitin' till the time comes for her to die and meet the man she loved and lost, havin' to live in the meantime, because she couldn't stop breathin' till her time come. So, as I say, she went out doin' plain sewin', beloved by all both great and small, but a mourner if there ever wuz one, lookin' at his picture day in and day out, which she wears in her bosom in a locket—a handsome, manly face, took before our govermunt made a crazy lunatick and a murderer of him.

Jest as different from Arvilly as day is from night, but the cold hands of grief holds their hearts together and I spoze that she will always make it her home with Arvilly as long as she lives, she wants her to—that is if the plan I have in my head and heart don't amount to anything, but I hope for the land sake that it will, for as I've said many a time and gin hints to her there never wuz two folks more made for each other than she and Elder White.

But she's gone now to the Philippines as a nurse, which shows how different she and Arvilly feels; Arvilly sez that she wouldn't do anything to help the govermunt agin in any way, shape or manner, not if they should chain her and drag her to the front; she would die before she would help the great, wicked, remorseless power that killed her husband for a little money. She's made in jest that way, Arvilly is, jest as faithful to the remembrance of her wrongs as a dog is to a bone, settin' and gnawin' at it all the time, that is her way, she wuz made jest so. And when they come to collect her taxes last year she says:

"No taxes will you ever git out of me to help rare up saloons and Canteens to kill some other woman's husband."

"But," sez the tax man, a real good man he wuz and mild mannered, "you should be willing to help maintain the laws of your country that protects you."

And then I spose that man's hair (it wuz pretty thin, any way,) riz right up on his head to hear her go on tellin' about the govermunt killin' her husband. But seein' she wuz skarin' him she kinder quelled herself down and sez:

"What has this country ever done for me. I have had no more voice in makin' the laws than your dog there. Your dog is as well agin off, for it don't have to obey the laws that it has no part in makin'. If it digs up a good bone it don't have to give it to some dog politician to raise money to buy dog buttons to kill other dogs and mebby its own pups. Not one cent of taxes duz this hell-ridden govermunt git out of me again—if I can help it."

A Brush with the Law

The man ketched up his tax list and flewed from the house, but returned with minions of the law who seized on and sold her shote she wuz fattin' for winter's use; sold it to the saloon keeper over to Zoar for about half what it wuz worth, only jest enough to pay her tax. But then the saloon keeper controlled a lot of bum votes and the collector wanted to keep in with him.

Yes, as I wuz sayin', Waitstill Webb is as different from Arvilly as a soft moonlight night lit by stars is from a snappin' frosty noonday in January. Droopin' like a droopin' dove, knowin' and feelin' that the govermunt wuz the worst enemy she and her poor dead boy ever had, as it turned out, but still ready to say:

"Oh Lord, forgive my enemy, the Government of the United States, for it knows what it does."

Which she felt wuz ten-fold worse than as if it did wickedly without knowin' it, and she knew that they knowed all about it and couldn't deny it, for besides all the good men and wimmen that had preached to 'em about it, they had had such sights of petitions sent in explainin' it all out and beggin' 'em to stop it, onheeded by them and scorfed at. But she stood ready to go agin to the front and serve the govermunt as a nurse, trying to heal the woonds caused by bullet and knife, and the ten-fold worse woonds caused by our govermunt's pet wild beast it rents out there to worry and kill its brave defenders. I looked forward with warm anticipations to seein' her, for I sot store by her. She had fixed over my gray alpacky as good as new, and made me a couple of ginghams, and I thought more of havin' her with me than I did of her work, and once when I wuz down with a crick in the back, and couldn't stir, she come right there and stayed by me and did for me till the creek dwindled down and disappeared. Her presence is some like the Bam of Gilead, and her sweet face and gentle ways make her like an angel in the sick room. Arvilly is more like a mustard plaster than Bam. But everybody knows that mustard is splendid for drawin' attention to it; if it draws as it ort to, mustard must and will attract and hold attention. And I spoze there hain't no tellin' what good Arvilly has done and mebby will do by her pungent and sharp tongue to draw attention to wrongs and inspire efforts to ameliorate 'em. And the same Lord made the Bam of Gilead and mustard, and they go well together. When mustard has done its more painful work then the Bam comes in and duz its work of healin' and consolin'. 'Tennyrate anybody can see that they are both on em' as earnest and sincere in wantin' to do right as any human creeters can be, and are dretful well thought on all over Jonesville and as fur out as Loontown and Zoar.

"LIFT UP YOUR VEIL," SAID ARVILLY

What Arvilly Went Through

Some wimmen would have held a grudge aginst the man that murdered her husband and not bore the sight of the one who loved and mourned him so constant. But Arvilly had too much good horse sense for that; she contends that neither of the men who wuz fightin' wuz much to blame. She sez that if a sane, well man should go out and dig a deep pit to catch men for so much a head, and cover it all over with green grass and blossoms and put a band of music behind it to tempt men to walk out on it, to say nothin' of a slidin' path leadin' down to it, all soft with velvet and rosy with temptations, if a lot of hot-headed youth and weak men and generous open-minded men who wuzn't lookin' for anything wrong, should fall into it and be drownded for so much a head, she sez the man who dug the pit and got so much a-piece for the men he led in and ruined would be more to blame than the victims, and she sez the man who owned the ground and encouraged it to go on would be more to blame than the man who dug the pit. And further back the men who made the laws to allow such doin's, and men who voted to allow it, and ministers and the Church of Christ, who stood by like Pilate, consenting to it and encouraged by their indifference and neglect what they might have stopped if they wanted to—they wuz most to blame of all.

Well, this is what Arvilly has went through.

On Tropical Seas

Day by day we sailed onwards, and if the days wuz beautiful, the nights wuz heavenly, lit by the glowin' moon that seemed almost like another sun, only softer and mellerer lookin'; and the lustrous stars of the tropics seemed to flash and glitter jest over our head almost as if we could reach up and gather 'em in our hands into a sheaf of light.

The weather seemed to moderate and we had to put on our thinnest garments in the middle of the day. But my poor Josiah could not make much change; he had to wear his pepper-and-salt costoom in publick, which wuz pretty thick, but I fixed sunthin' for him to wear in our state-room, where we passed considerable time. I took one of my outing jackets that was cut kinder bask fashion, trimmed with lace and bows of ribbon and pinned it over in the back, and it fitted him quite well and wuz cool. He liked it; he thought it become him it wuz so dressy, but I wouldn't let him appear in publick in it.

I dressed Tommy in his summer suit, and wore my figgered lawn and wuz none too cool. We only had one heavy storm, but that wuz fearful; everything dashed round and wuz broke that could be. I put Tommy in his little crib and fastened him in, and fastened my most precious treasure, Josiah, to the berth. I then tied myself up, and we bore it as well as we could, though every time the ship went down into the trough of the sea I felt that it wuz dubersome about its ever comin' out agin, and every time it mounted up on one of them stupendous billers, higher than the Jonesville meetin' house, I felt doubtful whether or no it would fall bottom side up or not. Tommy wuz cryin', and Josiah wuz kinder whimperin', though for my sake he wuz tryin' to bear up. But I'll hang a curtain up before that seen and not take it down agin till we wuz all ontied and the sun wuz shinin' down on smoother waters.

TO-DAY

SEEN by memory's magic,
Yesterday is golden:
Hope illumines the morrow.
Eyes are only holden
From some fair illusion
When they view to-day,
With its mists of morning
Clearly blown away.

Yet of all the morrows
That from me are hidden,
All the bright days ended
Coming back unbidden,
None are, was or will be Richer in its way,
Than this open-handed
Slightly prized to-day.

Stepmothers Again

THE little plaint of a stepmother published not long ago, on this page, has elicited many responses. From a large budget I select two answers showing a truly maternal spirit. One lady says, "I too am a stepmother. Voluntarily and for the love we bore them, we have, some of us, married widowers, and we have assumed one of the most difficult positions it is ever the lot of women to occupy. Bravely, then, let us go forward to do what we conscientiously believe to be right in the sight of God, not hoping always to have our motives appreciated or understood, either by our family or the world. As for the dear children, let us remember that they are no better and no worse than other children. They have all the heedlessness, self-confidence and inexperience of youth in general, and need to be gently led and guided to do the right by older heads.

We have undertaken to be one of those heads and I hope, before assuming this responsibility, we have made an earnest resolve to ever have the best interests of these children at heart.

When the children are wilful or disobedient or have a stubborn fit let us try to do what their own mother would do—advise, counsel, weep over and pray for them, if need be, but ever be ready to forgive and forget, never varying in our purpose to try to do them good and make their home life as happy as possible.

Let us make as few complaints to the father as we can and never in the presence of the children. If husband and wife disagree in regard to discipline, they must not let the children suspect it.

Never correct when angry, and seldom, if ever, in the presence of their father. When he is in the house let him look after their conduct. We may not say much, but we do not like to be a silent witness while another corrects or administers punishment to our child. Girls of fourteen and sixteen I believe to be too old for punishment of any kind but kindness. Forbearance, wise counsel, and a Christ-like example will often work wonders.

May I first add that contrary to the existing impression the advent of a sweet, charming baby in our home has done more to bind the family together than all else combined. Baby has captured all our hearts, and in her we find a common bond of sympathy. She has broadened and deepened mother's sympathies, enabling her to comprehend more fully the irremediable loss the other child has sustained. A mother's place she can never fill, but she will endeavor to step into that lonely heart and throw a little sunshine into the impoverished life, thus trying to fill, in a humble way, the place of a stepmother.

ONE OF THE CRITICISED.

Another young stepmother who at twenty-one took charge of two babies, the children of her own eldest sister, writes, after six years of married life, that her home is perfectly happy, and her boys, two and four years old at the time of her marriage, are as dear to her as if they were her very own. They cannot remember their mother at all, as one was only twenty months old, and the other nineteen days when she was taken away. This dear lady has a tender, womanly heart, and a great deal of excellent common sense. I shall quote from one or two other letters next week.

True Service

The one who prays most, or worships most, or works most, is not the truest servant of God; but he who has learned to throw away his own desires that he may be free to help any other struggling soul into nobler living and has thus gained a place in God's service very near to the holy Christ.

Work, or prayer, or worship, without self-sacrifice, must be only superficial; there can be no depth nor reality in it; the life-principle—the heart—is lacking. Would you be a real Christian, would you do effective work, would you have your prayers answered, would you feel the Divinity you worship? Look out of self into another life, and, forgetful of your own need, bring the love of Christ to another soul.

Then your service will be glorified with a halo, and your soul will be in accord with the Redeemer.

A MODERN HEBE

A Jinrikisha Ride

But for the fear that my pleasure was tiring out the coolie trotting along so nimbly between the shafts, I fancy I would not mind changing places with the pretty Japanese ladies out for an airing. The graceful little carriage is said to be very comfortable, and convenient. Our missionaries often make use of them in going from one point to another, and there is a tradition that it was an American missionary who made the original model, inventing it for the comfort of an invalid wife. This statement is however contradicted by some, who claim that though the Japanese are clever imitators rather than inventors at first hand, yet the little wheeled wagon which the coolies draw so easily was the creation of a native who lived at Kyoto. Whether the Japanese are largely originators or not, they do know how to alter and adapt and take what they can use, and their rapid progress in the last half century in assimilating European ideas is very extraordinary. A coolie makes about forty miles a day when on a journey with a jinrikisha, or he goes a few miles only, as his patrons prefer.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—ELLEN DEAN. Dolly Varden is a very charming character in a novel by Charles Dickens, entitled, Barnaby Rudge. A flowered kind of cambric, very fashionable a few years ago, was named Dolly Varden.

—JOHN JAMES. Aunt Patience is old enough to be your mother, and she memorizes with the greatest ease, just as readily as when she was twenty. It is all a matter of paying attention and giving memory something to do.

—WILHELMINA. Aunt Patience advises you to dismiss your admirer. He has treated you very cavalierly in not answering your letters and in preferring the company of other young women to yours. A girl must be the wooed, not the wooer.

—M. G. Unhappy marriages are so common, unfortunately, that your story is not altogether exceptional. As the law has given you a divorce, you are certainly free from any obligation to your former husband, and, should you meet him, it would be as a stranger. You are not called upon to speak to or otherwise recognize him, and your doing so would be needlessly embarrassing to both. If you have resumed your maiden name, and have a child or children of whom you retain the custody, you should be addressed as Mrs., not Miss G. The law of your state and your own wish must determine you as to another marriage. For your children's sake, it would seem better that you should not marry while their father is living, but of this phase of the case, you must determine for yourself.

"SUFFER THE LITTLE ONES"

I WONDER if ever the children
Who were blessed by the Master of old,
Forgot he had made them his treasures
The dear little lambs of his fold.
I wonder if angry and wilful
They wandered afar and astray,
The children whose feet had been guided
So safe and so sure in the way.

One would think that the mothers at evening
Soft smoothing the silk-tangled hair,
And low leaning down to the murmur
Of sweet childish voices in prayer,
Oft bade the small pleaders to listen,
If haply again they might hear
The words of the gentle Redeemer
Borne swift to their reverent ear.

And my heart cannot cherish the fancy
That one of those children went wrong,
And was lost from the peace and the shelter—
Shut out from the feast and the song.
To the day of gray hairs each remembered,
I think, how the hands that were riven
Were laid on their heads; that Christ uttered,
"Of such were the kingdom of heaven."

Winter Pleasures

SNOW and ice present no formidable aspects to the girl of to-day who can fasten her skates on her trimly shod feet and glide over the smooth surface of the frozen lake as if she were a bird. All who skate know that the exercise is the very poetry of motion, and that no outdoor sport surpasses this in its power to stir the blood and bring the glow of health to the cheek. It is usually a social pleasure, and, I think, as our pretty maiden warms her hands over the friendly blaze which leaps up so merrily that somebody is not very far away, and that she hears his cheery whistle and the tramp of his arriving footsteps. It is her brother, or her cousin, or the neighbor's son who is her comrade and chum, and they are used to skating together, and very likely, too, there will be a party of friends all sallying forth, and our little lady is waiting for them. The fields are white, the shrubs are coated with armor of ice, and if there are any birds in the thicket they will greedily pick up the crumbs which, I hope, the girl will remember to scatter for them on the snowy ground. A short walk off the village homes cluster, and the village spire rises, the white church steeple which dominates the country landscape, and points ever to heaven.

I have called the winsome lassie a modern Hebe because Hebe was the ancient goddess of health, and if she had secrets they were compounded of dawn and dew, of rain and sun, of fresh air and the gladness of living out of doors. Our girls are beginning to find out that health is to be had by those who breathe long draughts of pure breezes, who walk, run, climb, and in short, tarry for hours at a time in the open, under the sky, and that more frequently than we dream, we hold our physical strength and beauty in our own hands. Winter is not a time for young people to shiver and mope in the house. Outdoor sports beckon them, and they may enjoy great freedom even under Winter's blustering auspices if they are bold, brave and buoyant.

Statesmen and Temperance

The Congressional Temperance Society and its 67 Years of Active Service at the Nation's Capital

HON. W. W. GROUT

SECRETARY F. D. POWERS

THE venerable Congressional Temperance Society of Washington has renewed its annual crusade against intemperance. On arriving at the National Capital, all new Congressmen are immediately solicited to enroll themselves in its membership. The Society is no respecter of persons and approaches all legislators, even the dignified senators, without the slightest hesitancy. Most of the new arrivals are surprised to learn of the existence of such a Society, and express astonishment when told that it has been in existence for over half a century, and has included in its ranks some of the greatest statesmen in the nation and exerted a wonderful influence in correcting the morals and preserving the dignity of the law making bodies of the country.

Years ago intemperance was much more common than now. A marvelous change has been wrought. Liquor is never seen in either House, and an intoxicated congressman on the floor would cause the legislators to open their eyes in startled amazement.

The Congressional Temperance Society was founded in 1833, and was fostered by such celebrities as Daniel Webster, Millard Fillmore, and others equally notable, gathering its patrons from prominent men in many States. It was organized on February 26, 1833, three months before the first National Temperance Convention was held in Philadelphia. Its first meeting was held in the historic old Senate Chamber, now occupied by the Supreme Court, and its platform declared its object to be "to discountenance by example and by kind moral influence the use of ardent spirits and the traffic in it throughout the community." Hon. Lewis Cass, of Michigan, Secretary of War, was chosen president. Theodore Frelinghuysen, Senator from New Jersey, submitted a constitution which was adopted and signed by one hundred members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

For some time the work progressed satisfactorily, but it was found that the pledge was not sufficiently binding. A new organization called "The Congressional Abstinence Society," was formed and new pledge and constitution adopted. In 1876 the Society became especially alive to the purpose of its existence, and has enjoyed increasing usefulness and prosperity since that time. On its roll appear such names as George N. Briggs, of Massachusetts; Thomas W. Gilmer, of Virginia; J. R. Giddings, of Ohio; Rufus Choate, of Massachusetts; John Blair, of Tennessee; Henry A. Wise, of Virginia; Millard Fillmore, of New York; Thomas F. Marshall, of Kentucky; W. W. Ellsworth, of Connecticut; Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire; Thomas Ewing, of Ohio. Justices of the Supreme Court, Cabinet officers, Senators, Representatives, and heads of Departments. Among later subscribers were Thomas W. Ferry, Henry Wilson, Schuyler Colfax, William Windom, Lot M. Morrill, John A. Logan, William Washburn, James Monroe, Hiram Price, James A. Garfield, F. T. Frelinghuysen, Henry V. Blair, John D. Long, A. E. Morse, Nelson Dingley, and scores of others well known in public life. Hon. William W. Grout, of Vermont, is the present President, having succeeded the late Nelson Dingley, who held the position for fourteen years. The other officers are, Vice-presidents, Secretary John D. Long, Senators Frye and Kyle, and Representatives Johnson, Ellis and Pugh; Secretary, F. D. Powers.

A Welcome to Josiah

LANESVILLE, Gloucester, Jan. 24, 1900.

DEAR EDITOR: When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD announced that this year they had secured Aunt Samantha to take its readers on a trip around the world, we knew that there was a treat in store for us. We have been intimately acquainted with Samantha and Josiah Allen for more than twenty years. But imagine our disappointment when Josiah refused to accompany us on the trip!

We have been as homesick for him and his unique attitude in regard to new ideas and have wanted him as badly as Samantha, and to none were the welcome words "Samantha! stop the ship! I'm coming," more welcome than to us. Now there is nothing lacking to complete our content, and we shall indeed enjoy our trip under the auspices of Josiah Allen and his wife. (Mrs.) L. C. CLEMENTS.

So it is with health; we never realize its value until it is gone. When old time strength and vigor are wanting it is the best to look at once to the blood. Purify it by taking Hood's Sarsaparilla, and restored appetite, perfect digestion, steady nerves and even temper will prove that it is bringing back the glow of perfect health.

Hundreds of millions of tins of Royal Baking Powder have been used in making biscuit, cake and hot breads in this country, and every housekeeper using it has rested in perfect confidence that her food would be light, sweet and wholesome.

Artistic Monuments in White Bronze

COST NO MORE THAN PLAIN ONES

Marble is entirely out of date. Granite soon gets moss-grown, discolored, requires constant expense and care, and eventually crumbles back to Mother Earth. Besides it is very expensive.

White Bronze is strictly everlasting. It cannot crumble with the action of frost. Moss-growth is an impossibility. It is more artistic than any stone. Then why not investigate it? It has been adopted for nearly one hundred public monuments. We have designs from $4.00 to $4,000.00. Write at once for free designs and information. It puts you under no obligations. NEW HOME RUPTURE CURE

Remarkable Method that Heals Any Rupture Without Pain or Danger

No Operation or Detention From Work —Is Cheap, Safe and Sure.

Dr. W. S. Rice has backed up with convincing facts his statement that rupture can be cured at the patients' home without pain, danger operation or detention from work. He has invented a cheap and reliable method that has met with marvelous success and thousands of people ruptured for years have been permanently cured. It cured R. M. Wilsie, of Brandon, Wis., who had been ruptured 20 years. Mrs. M. E. Smith, Rockingham, Vt., was badly ruptured and cured herself by Dr. Rice's method. Wm. Bigford, Bishop Mills, Ont., tried various trusses with no success and finally cured himself by the Rice plan. Jacob Lindner, Drums, Pa., owes his cure to Dr. Rice. G. Nilson, Sogn, Minn., has a double rupture and calls Dr. Rice's method a God-send.

Several thousand cases are reported cured by this remarkable method and as it is very low in price, easily used, adapted to either sex, adults or children, every ruptured person should at once investigate it. Write to Dr. W. S. Rice, 392-D, Main St., Adams, N. Y., and he will send you a full description, so you can cure yourself in a few weeks, long before the heavy work of the springtime begins. Do not fail to write to-day and if you know of others afflicted, send their names for this wonderfully valuable information. They will appreciate your kindness.

The Liquor Traffic

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 18. Heb. 2:1-15

WHILE we may question the good taste of the person responsible for the choice of such a passage of Scripture to associate with the topic, there can be no doubt in the mind of any Christian about the desirability of the achievement suggested. To put an end to the liquor traffic would be to lift from society the worst of its many burdens. The fruitful source of crime, pauperism and domestic misery ought to be exterminated. Every Christian patriot would rejoice at its extinction. It is the enemy of the home and of the community and of the church and school. We would be justified in addressing it in the words that Paul used to Elymas: "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" Its victims are to be found in our gutters, in our jails, in our lunatic asylums and our almshouses. And, still worse, they are to be found in our homes, where wives, mothers and children, the innocent victims of the wickedness of husband and father, mourn over its power. What a happy revolution it would make in our land if we could rid ourselves of it!

The little word, "How" is the crux of the problem. To the Prohibitionist, who would cut the Gordian Knot with the sword of legislation, or constitutional amendment, we wish a hearty God-speed. He certainly has courage and deserves success. But the heart fails as the difficulties in his path are considered. To convince legislatures: to secure the election of executive officers who would enforce the law; to watch all the loopholes through which evasion might enter, are achievements that might daunt the bravest spirit. Many earnest temperance men, who would hail his victory with heartfelt rejoicing, shrink from the struggle it would involve and have honest doubts of the possibility of success. They hold aloof, not because they have any sympathy with the enemy, but because they believe that the citadel in which he is entrenched cannot be carried by the Prohibitionist's weapons. There is, however, a distinct advantage in his method even if he failed of complete success. It would be a gain to drive the traffic into secrecy. By making it illegal, we would be spared the flaunting temptation it now holds out on our street corners. There are men who are unable to resist its attractions and are unable to pass its brilliantly illuminated portals, who would not seek it in its hiding place and so might escape its fascination. For such men Prohibition even with evasions and secret violations would be a benefit.

The real hope, however, lies in individual conviction and, like Christianity, temperance wins its chief triumphs one by one. When the majority of a community has been induced to forswear the use of intoxicants, the liquor traffic is diminished, and when the whole community is pledged to abstinence, the traffic dies a natural death. The Prohibitionist can afford to give his efforts to such a crusade. He, too, needs the individual vote before he can apply his more summary method. Both lines of strategy must start from the same principle. And the start should be early. It is with the children that our hope lies. If they could be convinced that there is no beverage so good as pure water, if they could be induced to cultivate a liking for it, the next generation would be a sober one. The church too might lend more aid than it has hitherto done. It might logically exclude liquor dealers from its membership, and it might insist on every new member being pledged to total abstinence. The evil is so formidable, its influence is so powerful, its work is so injurious, that every weapon, educational, religious and legislative that is available, should be brought into service against it. More than all, the need is for united, prayerful, well directed effort against the common enemy.

"None are so deaf as those who won't hear." Many are they, however, who have heeded advice and taken Hood's Sarsaparilla, thereby escaping winter's colds, coughs, fevers and chills.

THE TOUCHSTONE

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

CHAPTER XV.

A Clue to the Mystery

PACING the corridor anxiously, Douglas waited with what patience he could summon for Dr. Fosbrook to emerge from his brother's room. It was half an hour before he appeared and then Douglas asked the question with which physicians are so familiar.

Dr. Fosbrook replied: "I scarcely know how to answer you. Your brother tells me that he had a bad attack of fever in India (following on a slight sunstroke), and it is from a return of this that he is suffering. It is very difficult for a medical man, unless he has known the patient previously, to judge at first sight how far the constitution has been weakened and what power there is to repel a second attack. In your brother's case there seems to be considerable irritability of the brain, perhaps the result of the sunstroke or of the wear and tear he has been going through lately. It is a most unfortunate time for him to be ill, but we must keep him as quiet as possible, and to-morrow we must see about moving him, for it won't do, of course, for him to be here on the spot during all that must be going on in the next few days. Well, it must just go as it will now," said Dr. Fosbrook autocratically, "and if one word to him would make all the difference, that word must not be spoken. Better a live private individual than a dead Member of Parliament. There! I didn't mean to startle you, but it's as well you should know how careful we shall need to be."

"Could you not stay with him to-night?" Douglas asked anxiously. "I have had no experience of nursing."

"No, I must get some rest. I am quite worn out. He will be all right for to-night, and I shall send a telegram for a professional nurse, who will be here to-morrow. He tells me he has some family matters to talk over with you. The talking will do him harm, but that will be balanced by the mental relief it will give him. Let him talk; do not check him nor encourage him. I will send some medicine that will give him sleep, and he will rest all the better after he has had his say. Now, good-night. I will be in early to-morrow with the nurse."

Douglas returned to his brother's room and found him eager to resume their talk.

"I must have this matter settled," he said, "before I can rest quietly. We have been estranged long enough and I am thankful that at last there is a sign of our coming to an understanding."

"So am I," said Douglas; "but for your own sake, Caryl, postpone as much of it as possible till you are well."

"Yes I will. Now to resume. Did you ever ask our uncle for money?"

"Never," said Douglas emphatically.

"In a letter of Dora Locke's she said that she was afraid that you were in difficulties, for you had been asking your uncle for money, and though the old man had given it to you, yet he had seemed annoyed; and she was afraid that it might be against your interests eventually. Then I wrote to you. Do you remember the letter? I was dreadfully afraid of saying the wrong thing, but I thought I had managed to put it so that if you were really in a fix you wouldn't mind telling me."

"I remember," said Douglas, "I wondered why you should think that I was likely to be in any kind of difficulty."

"Exactly so! Your letter read as though you were offended, or wished me to think you were."

"It was not meant so, I can assure you."

"I daresay not. But we are neither of us among the people whose pens always convey just what they mean. Perhaps, you remember, though, that you did not in so many words deny that you were or had been in need of money. . . . I can't trace it all out—I can't remember all the steps now—but I know that while you were writing to me of our uncle's prejudices against you, and at last you had thought it best to give up going to see him till he should send for you—Dora Locke was mentioning in the most casual matter-of-course way that you had spent this evening and that evening with the old man, and at last that she was glad to say that he had made over a sum to you that ought to put you out of debt and give you a good start in the world. I remember her very words: 'So much more sensible,' she said, 'than keeping you all the best years of your life waiting for dead men's shoes.'"

Caryl shifted his position uneasily, and looked almost appealing into his brother's attentive face.

"If she had seemed to be taking part against you I would never have taken her word against yours. But she seemed so friendly towards you; so pleased; and I—heaven knows that I didn't grudge you the money, but I did think you might have told me both why you wanted it and when you got it. It bothered me a good deal, but—I was bothered about other things, too, at that time. There are times in a man's life when even his brother doesn't come first with him. I said to myself that when I got back home, I would get to the bottom of it all. But, I daresay, my letters got stiffer—I didn't know what to write or how to write—and I know that yours did the same—caught it, perhaps, from mine."

"Very likely. But I wish you could be persuaded to leave all this alone just now," said Douglas gently. "I am sure it is doing you harm."

"It won't leave me alone!" said Caryl

Indirectly Caused the Death of the World's Greatest General

It is a matter of history that Napoleon was a gourmand, an inordinate lover of the good things of the table, and history further records that his favorite dish was fried onions; his death from cancer of stomach, it is claimed also, was probably caused from his excessive indulgence of this fondness for the odorous vegetable.

The onion is undoubtedly a wholesome article of food, in fact has many medicinal qualities of value, but it would be difficult to find a more indigestible article than fried onions, and to many people they are simply poison, but the onion does not stand alone in this respect. Any article of food that is not thoroughly digested becomes a source of disease and discomfort, whether it be fried onions or beef steak.

The reason why any wholesome food is not promptly digested is because the stomach lacks some important element of digestion; some stomachs lack peptone, others are deficient in gastric juice, still others lack Hydro chloric acid.

The one thing necessary to do in any case of poor digestion is to supply those elements of digestion which the stomach lacks, and nothing does this so thoroughly and safely as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Dr. Richardson, in writing a thesis on treatment of dyspepsia and indigestion, closes his remarks by saying, "for those suffering from acid dyspepsia, shown by sour, watery risings, or for flatulent dyspepsia shown by gas on stomach, causing heart trouble and difficult breathing, as well as for all other forms of stomach trouble, the safest treatment is to take one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. I advise them because they contain no harmful drugs, but are composed of valuable digestives, which act promptly upon the food eaten. I never knew a case of indigestion or even chronic dyspepsia which Stuart's Tablets would not reach."

Cheap cathartic medicines claiming to cure dyspepsia and indigestion can have no effect whatever in actively digesting the food and to call any cathartic medicine a cure for indigestion is a misnomer.

Every druggist in the United States and Canada sells Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and they are not only the safest and most successful but the most scientific of any treatment for indigestion and stomach troubles.

I HAVE THE BEST

Brain

and

on earth for all weakened conditions, regardless of cause. It is a liquid remedy, which is of special value in cases of weak and irregular action of the heart, neurasthenia, sick and nervous headache, nervous indigestion, many forms of dyspepsia, St. Vitus' dance, vertigo, dizziness, rush of blood to the head from change of life, spasmodic twitching of the nerves of the face or any part of the body, insomnia, hysteria, paralysis, locomotor-ataxia, and all complications which may be caused by abuses which produce a weakened condition of the system. It is also invaluable in the treatment of the debility incident to old age, mental strain and overwork, and all forms of mental and nervous disease.

It acts directly upon irritated nerve tissues; its restorative effects are very quickly manifested, and, aided by its use, deranged nervous functions soon regain a natural and healthy condition.

It should be distinctly understood, Dr. Johnson's Brain and Nerve Tonic is not a factory preparation, is not of the "cure-all" variety, and has nothing of quackery, humbug, or the brazen fraud of widely advertised panaceas in its composition. It is simply a superior prescription for the cure of nervous complaints which has been used and improved during upwards of thirty years' private practice by the Doctor, and one which has proven so universally unfailing that he feels that it should be given a wider field of usefulness.

Interested persons should write Dr. Johnson at once in full confidence, stating symptoms carefully, with the assurance that the correspondence will be held sacredly confidential, and the same careful conscientious treatment accorded correspondents that is given the Doctor's private practice. The Doctor will send a full month's treatment of the Brain and Nerve Tonic to any address on receipt of $1.00.

wistfully. "Well, the last letter I got from Dora Locke, just before I sailed, she said that she was uneasy, that my uncle seemed to be getting even more capricious than old people generally: that he had again been very liberal to you, and now seemed to have taken offence at something, or—I can't tell you how she put it, but she implied that you did not care to come near him any more, now that you had got all you could hope for out of him!"

He paused, but Douglas was trying not to feel hurt at what his words for the first time made clear, and was trying too hard to be able at the moment to find anything to say.

"So I came back," went on Caryl, "and I fancied that you were not very pleased to see me. I daresay you were thinking the same of me. I didn't know how we were ever to be comfortable together till we had cleared up things somehow; but I couldn't think how to question you without insulting you. I thought that my uncle when he was in a confidential mood might tell me the whole story, but he was too ill to be questioned, and his memory was not always available. He grumbled sometimes about kindness that he had shown to you, and 'a poor return.' But it seemed to me more as though he was annoyed at your not having been to see him than determined not to see you, as you had told me he was."

"It was Mrs. Locke who reported that he refused to see me, and advised me not to call again for a time," said Douglas significantly.

Again Caryl dropped the hand with which he was screening his face from the light, and their eyes met. But before either spoke there came a tap at the door, and the chambermaid entered with a piece of paper which she handed to Caryl.

It was the back of a letter, very neatly and securely twisted up, and addressed to "C. Lingard, Esq."

"Is the lady downstairs?" asked Caryl, as he glanced at what was written inside; and as the girl answered "Yes" he signed to her to wait outside for a reply, and flung the note to his brother. It ran:

"So grieved!—only just heard that you are not well. May I come up and see what can be done? I am worth something as a nurse, as you know.—D. L."

"Write her a line, Earl," said Caryl hurriedly. "Tell her that you are with me, and that I don't want any one else."

Douglas wrote as desired, without waiting to find any polite circumlocutions, and handed his note to the maid.

"Fool that I am!" said Caryl when Douglas returned. "I am forgetting the chief thing, the only real excuse I had for thinking that you might really have acted as Dora Locke led me to believe. One day when I was sitting alone with my uncle he began to talk to me about his will. He said something about changes he had been obliged to make in it, and that it was better for young people to know what they had to depend upon and then to make their own way for themselves. I might be surprised, he said, to find that he had not so much to leave, after all; but there were other claims besides mine, though I might naturally expect to come first. And then he added that he had been disappointed in you, and that you never came to see him now. It was all vague and incoherent, and any attempt to question him only put him out, but he was evidently talking of what had been in his mind a good while. And in less than a week after that the old man was gone; and looking over the notebooks he left behind him, I found, about the dates I had been led to expect to see them, entries of large sums drawn from the bank and paid to D. L. Once more, to make sure, I asked the lawyer who drew up his will whether any allusion had been made to you, and he said that he had been given to understand that Mr. Lingard's younger nephew was already provided for. . . . Now, Douglas, speaking the whole truth and not trying to spare me at all, what should you have thought if you had been in my place?"

"Very likely I should have thought as you did, and held my tongue as you did," answered Douglas.

By the employment of this drug I have been able to relieve some of the most distressing afflictions of this class, and now regard Tartarlithine as the most valuable remedy at our disposal in the treatment of this class of affections. In rheumatism and in gout Tartarlithine can be administered with confidence."

Mr. H. N. Warner, of Kearney, Neb., says:

"In 1894 I was attacked with paralysis in my left side. You might stick a pin to the head into my left hip and I would not feel it. I was unable to do any kind of work and had to be turned in bed. I fully made up my mind that I could not be cured, as I had used all kinds of medicine and had tried many doctors.

At last I was advised to try Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and I very reluctantly commenced their use last September. Before I had finished my first box I began to feel much better, and by the time I had used six boxes the paralysis disappeared, and although two months have passed since I finished my last box, there has been no recurrence of the disease."

From the Advertiser, Axtell, Neb.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are never sold by the dozen or hundred, but always in packages. At all druggists, or direct from the Dr. Williams Medicine Co., Schenectady, N. Y., 50 cents per box, 6 boxes $2.50.

$10,000 More for India

Another Remittance to the American Missionaries in India who are Fighting Famine

LETTERS received from missionaries in India last week show, as was feared, that the pressure of famine is being felt over a larger area, as time passes, and with increased severity. The inhabitants of the states under native rule are entering those governed by the British, in the hope that the sympathy denied them by their own government may be extended to them by Christians. This of course increases the burdens of the states to which they go, but it also affords an opportunity for Gospel work that seldom comes. Multitudes who come seeking food for their bodies will hear the message of Christ, which under happier circumstances might never have reached them. If the missionaries to whom those go, who are unable to go on the government relief works, were able to employ them and feed those who cannot work, such as children and the most feeble of the women, many might be won for Christ's kingdom. But even to supply the need of these, the missionaries have no funds available.

An urgent appeal comes from Miss L. E. Marks and Miss E. V. Tryon, two American missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Ajmere, in Rajputana, in British India. They say: "Three years ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S appeal to its readers for help resulted in the missionaries in India being able to succor thousands of famished people. We little thought then that like appeals would soon be needed; but famine as gaunt and terrible as before is now here, menacing millions of people. The centre of the trouble has now changed to Rajputana, though other districts are affected to a deplorable extent. We are daily witnesses of distress and suffering that are absolutely indescribable. Three weeks ago, a company numbering two thousand, passed through Kishangarh—a town near us—having sought help in another district. They had been disappointed, for they found famine everywhere, and they were returning in despair to their own villages. They said that hundreds had died of exhaustion and starvation by the roadside. Oh, it is awful to see the emaciated creatures and hear their cries. Even at this early stage of the calamity we cannot stir out without seeing children and grown people too, who are mere skeletons. Prompt help would save many lives."

The Central Provinces which bore the brunt of the famine of 1897 are again suffering severely. Rev. F. R. Felt, of Khandwa, C. P., writes that the missionaries could help the people permanently by employing them to dig wells. There is the more need for this because in some towns the Christians have been forbidden by their Hindoo neighbors to approach existing wells and they have to go long distances and in secrecy to obtain water. The food in Dr. Felt's district is now four times its normal price. There are many Christians who would prefer to work for money or food to receiving it as charity and Dr. Felt could thus use the funds supplied to him without pauperizing the recipients.

A similar method is advocated by Rev. E. F. Frease, of the American mission in Gujerat. The missionaries there have a number of weavers in the district. By supplying them with yarn, as many as seventeen hundred persons could be supported. A market has been found for a large part of the cloth, as the collector of Kaira District has ordered that the supplies needed for poorhouses, hospitals, etc., shall be purchased from the missionaries.

All reports indicate that the missionaries are preparing to take wise and prudent measures for the relief of the people and need only a small capital to begin operations. They rely on receiving help from the Christian people of America, who stood by them so nobly three years ago. The contributions received at this office from our readers since sending our last remittance of $5,000, have been so encouraging that the proprietor of this journal has cabled a further sum of ten thousand dollars to the missionaries, who are surrounded by this awful misery and are struggling so bravely to save lives.

. . . Lincoln . . . Memorial University

IN acknowledging receipt of $311.60 in contributions for the Lincoln Memorial University, received through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Gen. O. . Howard writes as follows:

Our good work at Cumberland Gap costs an erage of $600 a month, and as I have—by our help and that of other contributors—overed the mortgages, I beg for an endowment whose interest will be as much as that. 'e have over two hundred students now, and ore are asking to come. As fast as we an get work for them to partly pay their ay, the boys and girls of the mountains ome to us, offering themselves faster than we an make provision for them. Many donors ke to give to scholarships. One hundred ollars a year makes for us a good scholarip. Whatever amount—$25 or $50 or $100—nt to me, with the request that the donor be it in correspondence with the pupil who has at scholarship, will be so used. Our superintendent wants to arrange all donations to holarships, so that the young people may ceive the same through the channel of work our Industrial Department. What better ew Year's gift can you make than the $100 r less to start a scholarship? Ours is a hristian effort.

In a letter lately published in the Tribune, Gen. Howard thus characterizes is efforts in behalf of the neglected ountain whites:

You know the last message of my noble on, Colonel Guy Howard, who has just fallen Luzon, is burned into my brain, and affects y heart night and day. He was on the eamer (a launch) which was dragging barges led with necessary supplies for Lawton's my. The long tow was moving up the Chiita River, when an enemy in ambush on ore fired. A shot pierced his right lung. As e was dying he staggered toward the wheelan, while his men were returning the fire, nd said: "Whatever happens, keep the launch oing!" I keep answering to myself, "Yes, I ill!" So at once I have come here to New ork to go from office to office and from ouse to house to entreat my friends to aid in is educational part of our nation's work, pecially for those who have somehow been ft behind in the world's advancement, and et have the ability, lacking only a favorable pportunity.

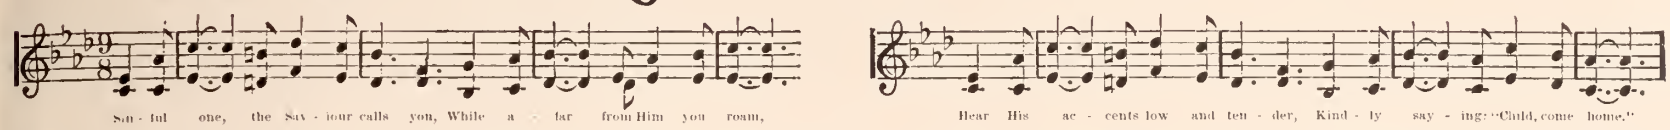
Sacred Songs from an Invalid Chair



Sin - ful one, the Sav - iour calls you, While a - far from Him you roam, Hear His ac - cents low and ten - der, Kind - ly say - ing: "Child, come home."

AMONG the earnest workers for Christ's Kingdom there are none more deserving of honor than those who have been chosen as the minstrels of the armies of salvation, whose sweet songs inspire with faith and confidence all who hear them. They are the poets and the singers who, like the harpers of olden times, sit near the King, and make the world melodious with the story of royal love and beneficence. But the Poets of the Cross have a far higher mission than the old-time bards or minne-singers, who hymned the praises of earthly greatness and glorified the cruel triumphs of the sword, for they tell the story, not of slaughter and conquest, but of a world-embracing, redeeming Love.

Foremost among the writers of hymns and sacred songs in our own day have been many whose names are widely known throughout the Christian world. P. P. Bliss, Horatius Bonar, Dean Alford, Frances Ridley Havergal, Fanny Crosby, R. Lowry, R. M. Offord, E. P. Hammond, Joseph Cook, Wilbur F. Crafts, S. Baring-Gould, S. F. Smith, H. L. Hastings, R. A. Dykes, and a host of others, including Mrs. A. S. Hawks, Mrs. Breck, Sarah Doudney and Mrs. Ellen H. Gates, might be mentioned. Some have written only a few hymns, while others, more prolific, have produced many beautiful, soul-stirring songs that have cheered a great multitude of hearts and given brightness and encouragement to those who are struggling upward to the spiritual life.

Fanny Crosby is the most venerable and the best beloved of modern hymn-writers, and her productions are numbered by the thousand. The story of her remarkable life-work is already familiar to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Another writer of sacred songs, whose work is of unusual interest, no less by reason of its extent and quality than for the extraordinary conditions under which it has been produced, is Jennie Wilson, of South Whitley, Indiana, whose photograph appears on this page. Miss Wilson is an invalid, having been lame from childhood, yet her whole life has been a bright example of talent, which has been sanctified and blessed to many souls.

COPYRIGHT, LOUIS KLOPSCH, 1900

JENNIE WILSON, THE INVALID POET AND AUTHOR OF 600 GOSPEL HYMNS

During the last fourteen years the name of Jennie Wilson has frequently appeared as the author of Gospel songs, but few of those using her hymns know that she is the occupant of an invalid's wheel-chair. She was born near South Whitley, on the farm where, with her aged mother, she now resides in the family of her sister, Mrs. J. Ulrey. Her father died in her infancy. When she was nearly four years old an attack of spinal trouble resulted in paralysis of the lower limbs, which skilful treatment has failed to cure. Being unable to attend school, she studied at home, read much and received some musical instruction. A natural love of music and poetry early led to verse writing, her first published works appearing in a local paper. Afterward, through the influence of Rev. J. D. Coverstone, she sent poems to a publication in Dayton, Ohio. These attracted the attention of music writers, by whom she was invited to write verses to be set to music.

Her first hymn was entitled, "All the Way," and, not knowing of its publication, she was pleasantly surprised when it was found in new singing books purchased by a Sunday School in her neighborhood.

From the beginning of her career, the knowledge of Fanny Crosby's great work as a hymn-writer has been an inspiration to Miss Wilson, who labored patiently and perseveringly, glad that in her weakness the Master had entrusted her with this "one talent" to use for his glory. More than six hundred hymns, besides numerous other productions, have gone out into the world from her pen. Among the most useful of these the following may be mentioned: "Precious Golden Grain," "Beautiful City of Peace" and "Jesus is Calling the Children," set to music by Prof. Wm. J. Kirkpatrick, of Philadelphia; "There Will be Light at the River," "Is it Well with Your Soul?" "Listen to the Spirit's Call" and "Go Forth to the Battlefield." She has been assured that her hymn, "I've No Other Place to Go," (which is based on John 6:68), has been blessed of God to the conversion of many souls. "Christ is Calling you To-night" and "Mercy's Door is

The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

These Questions Will be Answered Mch. 14

1. How far may a Christian church lend itself to the promotion of amusement, and is it right to use a church edifice for purposes of entertainment?
2. Who is the author of the following lines, and in what poem do they occur?

" Damned be whoever with sin doth play,
Though it hath been but playing;
In bitter earnestness will he atonement make."

3. What is the meaning and origin of the term "Godwin's oath"?
4. Was Peter a converted man when he betrayed Christ? If so why the language of Luke 22:32?
5. What are the comparative drink bills of Great Britain, France, Germany and Russia?
6. What city now existing has the record of greatest antiquity?
7. Had Mary, the mother of Jesus, any other children, so far as the Bible informs us?
8. If a stone mason who is a Christian is asked to build a wall, and he knows that the building is to be a billiard hall and saloon, is he in duty bound as a Christian to refuse to build said wall?
9. Can a person be truly converted to God and not enjoy reading God's Word?
10. Which is the longest railroad in the world?

Questions of the Week

1. What four living issues of our time may be grouped as the four most important?

1. The reaching of the whole world with the message of the Gospel of Christ. 2. The subjugation of the liquor traffic. 3. The establishment of right relations between labor and capital. 4. The substitution of arbitration for the appeal to arms in national disputes.

M. O. NICOLL.

2. What six promoters of sociological reform should be given pre-eminence? The answer need not be confined to Americans, but must be limited to names of persons now living.

Herbert Spencer, Tolstoi, the Duke of Argyll, Goldwin Smith, W. T. Stead, and Joseph Cook.

3. Does God's method of grace annul or revise his system of government? In other words, does the New Testament abrogate the laws of the Old Testament altogether or in part?

The Jewish ceremonial law with all its requirements finds its consummation in Christ, who takes the place of all its offerings and sacrifices. The moral law remains in force to be obeyed in the spirit. Righteous as that law is, it gives man no power to obey it, but Christ came and died "that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us" through the indwelling Spirit. Christ would not have died in order to give us the power to obey an absolutely abrogated law. Love is the fulfilling of the law and of that love, Christ is our perfect example and our strongest inspiration.

L. T. ENSIGN.

4. How many miles of steam railroad are there in the United States?

There were 189,870.87 miles of railroad in the United States on Dec. 31st, 1899. In addition to the track mileage there were 60,344.54 miles of side tracks, making a total mileage of 250,215.41 miles of track in actual use. 4,500 10 miles were built in 1899, which was the greatest mileage constructed in any year since 1890. Total cost of the railroads and equipment, $10,256,275,585 00. Total assets of all the railroad companies in the United States, $12,285,367,702.00. In 1899 the railroads of this country carried 514,982,288 passengers and moved 912,973,853 tons of freight. THOMAS ALPHRAM.

5. By what illustration may the fact that the twentieth century does not commence till the close of the year 1900 be most simply demonstrated?

By a square enclosing one hundred equal-sized smaller squares, placed in ten rows of ten squares each. Each small square represents a year. Taking the year one as the first year of the first century, place in the upper left-hand corner the figure 1 (or the figure 1801 for the first year of the nineteenth century). Put the figure 2 in the next square, 3 in the next, and so on, until the upper row of squares is filled. So continue to fill the squares until all are filled. The last square on the right hand lower corner will be 100 or 1900 respectively. It takes 100 completed years to make one century and 1900 completed years to make nineteen centuries. The illustration may not convince a man who thinks we are already in the twentieth century, for " A man convinced against his will

Is of the same opinion still."

S. W. TAYLOR.

6. How may we best solve what is known as the servant girl problem?

The employment of domestic help is at present largely a matter of securing crude and unskilled labor. A higher order of labor should be demanded. To ensure a supply for the demand would involve the establishing of training schools for domestic service. Graduates from such institutions would be sought after, earn better wages and win an appreciation that would do much to affect favorably the relation between the employer and the employed in domestic life.

E. WILSON.

7. Has the principle of business co-operation among employers and employed advanced sufficiently to promise its wide adaptation within the next decade?

The principle of business co-operation or profit sharing among employers and employed, has proved successful when given a fair trial, and seems well calculated to promote harmony between these often conflicting interests. It has not been sufficiently widely adopted to encourage the belief that it will be very generally so during the next decade, but much may be done in that time.

JOHN G. OSBORNE.

8. What text of Scripture may be presented as the most definite and powerful assertion of the deity of Christ?

In John 10: 10, Christ says: 'I and my Father are one." This is his own unqualified assertion of his oneness with the Father. He also prayed to the Father in these words: "And now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine ownself with the glory which I had with thee before the world was" (John 17: 5). St. John, in his gospel, opens his record of Christ with words used by Moses in introducing God upon the scene. "In the beginning God," says Moses. "In the beginning was the Word," says John, and adds: "And the Word was with God, and the Word was God." We identify this Word as Christ as we read John 1: 14: "And the Word was made flesh." The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews declares that God made the worlds through his Son and that to the Son he saith: "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever." And again: "Thou, Lord, in the beginning hast laid the foundation of the earth and the heavens are the work of thy hands." Paul, in writing to the Romans, speaks of Christ, "who is over all, God blessed forever." L. T. SHAW.

9. Has the divine law in reference to the punishment of murder, as declared in Genesis 9: 6, and as fully defined and detailed in Numbers 35, ever been repealed?

There is certainly no explicit repeal in the New Testament of the law referred to. Christ forbade the spirit of personal retaliation, which, owing to the weakness of human nature, had taken the place of judicial avenging of blood. The spirit of the New Testament is against merely vindictive punishment, but not against the meting out of just punishment to evil doers. E. S. LEONARD.

10. Which book of the Bible is the oldest, and on what ground is the claim substantiated?

The book of Job. The claim is based upon the following considerations: 1. The general tone and spirit of the book indicate an early period of the race. 2. The language used is a very early form of Hebrew. 3. The high age attained by the patriarch (42: 16), and the mention of only the three most ancient musical instruments (21: 12; 30: 31; comp. Gen. 4: 21; 31: 27). 4. The fact that the only idolatry spoken of, the worship of the heavenly hosts (31: 26–28), is the oldest known in history. 5. The absence of all references, direct or indirect, to the Mosaic law, the temple or tabernacle, the priesthood, and the sacrifices. It is impossible to conceive that a devout Jew could write after these had been established without speaking of them. 6. The absence of references to well-known facts of Israelitish history. The Exodus, e. g., is not mentioned, although the writer was evidently acquainted with Egypt and the desert, and the story of Jehovah's deliverance of his people would have been most pertinent to his argument. There are, possibly, references to the flood (22: 15, 16) and to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (18: 15), but no later facts are even hinted at. J. K. WILSON.

Miscellaneous Questions

E. L., Eaton, O. Is it right to have a kitchen in a Christian church for suppers and festivals and other gayeties?

It would be indecorous and out-of-place. There is nothing sacred in the brick and mortar of a church, but when the edifice has been solemnly dedicated to God as a house of worship, it should be kept at least reasonably free from gatherings of a nature that are not in harmony with its religious character.

Subscriber. 1. Is it wrong to do literary work on the Sabbath, when one feels the inspiration to write? 2. Would you advise a beginner in literary work to take a course in a school of journalism by mail, or spend the amount it will cost in books? 3. While we pray, should we not have in our imagination an object before us, for instance, Jesus Christ on the cross, or God upon the throne?

1. To the Christian, all work, except that which is of necessity or of mercy, is forbidden on the Sabbath. 2. There are many things that cannot be taught except by actual contact with the thing itself and this is one. Journalism can only be taught by actual service on the staff of a live, progressive publication. 3. The human conception of deity must vary with the individual, and no rule can be laid down to govern the imagination in spiritual things. The praying child has an impression of the grandeur and majesty of the Father, but it has also a distinct impression of His love and care. The sinner sees, through his prayer, an offended God and a despised Christ, while the Christian sees a living Father and a precious Redeemer.

Perry B., Spokane, Wash. 1. Are clairvoyants and palmists frauds? 2. Do you think phrenologists can tell anything about what a man is adapted to or about his past and future life?

1. They are ranked with conjurers and others, and belong to a class who live by imposing on the credulous. 2. No, they can tell nothing definite, although by interrogating the subject they may be able to give a shrewd estimate of character. The formation or contour of the head is not a safe index of intellectual qualities.

J. F., Indiana. After Adam and Eve had sinned God called for Adam; why not for Eve?

Because Adam was the head of the human family, and must first account for his transgression. Eve was not overlooked by God (Gen. 3: 13).

In 1867 under what is called the Act of Confederation, Ontario and Quebec were united to the Maritime Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. In 1870 the newly created province of Manitoba, in 1871 that of British Columbia, and in 1873 that of Prince Edward Island, were successively admitted into the confederation. In 1882 a provisional government was appointed, and thus the whole of British North America has been organized into a united political confederacy under the name of the Dominion of Canada.

N. A. W. H., Oregon. Has a person a right to expect to gain a title to heaven by connecting himself with some Christian church and never thereafter bear public testimony for Jesus?

No. Connecting one's self with a church does not give a title to heaven. That step is, or should be, the confession that we have secured a title to heaven through faith in Christ's finished work in our behalf. As far as possible, Christians should testify to their faith in the Saviour, but many a true and most useful Christian never gave a testimony in any public meeting. A glib testimony is not the unfailing sign of a gracious heart.

We have been quite overwhelmed, lately, with the many kind things written to us by our readers. We thank them cordially for their good wishes. This extract from a letter sent by a subscriber in Garden Grove, Cal., is a sample of many others:

Please give me the pleasure of saying to the busy editors that I have taken THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a number of years, and consider it the best general missionary paper I know of. Each year we are delighted with some new feature and such pleasing variety. The illustrations are fine, especially in the Samantha story. The artist in that case deserves great credit.

J. F. D., Rockland, N.Y. Is driving to church on Sunday, in the summer time, wrong, when the horse has to be left standing in the heat during the service?

It is cruel and wicked to compel a horse to stand in the burning heat when shelter can easily be provided.

Edward N., Westfield, Mass. What are the power, cost, and general characteristics of acetylene, as an illuminating agent?

It is a gas produced by slacking a lime, known as calcium carbide, in water. Carbide is closely related to common building lime, and may be called practically common lime impregnated with coal or carbon by means of an electric furnace. It is claimed that a pound of carbide, costing 3 3-4 cents, has a lighting power equal to 62 cubic feet of ordinary illuminating gas or two quarts of kerosene. Acetylene costs about the same as kerosene. It gives a clear, white, pleasant light, closely resembling daylight, and is safe to use and in every way adapted to the purposes of general illumination.

L. A. M., Sayre, Pa. Why did Christ give the parable of the unjust steward? (Luke 16: 1-9). Did not the man act in a most dishonest way?

His conduct was dishonest, but Christ did not hold up his dishonesty for imitation. He was inculcating the same lesson that he taught in Matt. 25: 34-40. Those who ministered to the poor and the afflicted, especially to the followers of Christ, would receive a reward out of all proportion to their services. If they knew how great that reward was, they would not let the opportunity escape them. The children of the world were more crafty and then he tells of one of them who worked a device at his master's expense to effect this object. He placed his master's debtors under an obligation, so that they might feel bound to help him, when he needed it, as he had helped them. It was not Christ who commended him, but his own lord, who admired the shrewdness of his dishonest scheme.

1. A minister of that church could tell you authoritatively, but we think it would be required of him. 2. He would be doing no wrong. The apostle's restriction does not apply to him, but to the general unity of the church. He taught that faith and baptism had one and the same meaning for all.

We have referred the question to Mr. Wm. R. Moody, his son and chosen biographer, who gives this answer:

The statements are both partially correct. The first application for membership was not accepted and he was placed upon probation for some time but at a later day was accepted. W. R. MOODY.

Our Pan-American Exposition

Representation for All Nations of the Western Hemisphere—Our New Possessions — Description of the Exposition Buildings

THE Pan-American Exposition, to be held at Buffalo, N. Y., from May 1 to November 1, 1901, will doubtless command as important a share of public interest as the great World's Fair, which opens at Paris in April of the esent year. Paris itself—the city of art d learning and beauty almost unrivaled an not give such display of electrical nders as can our American city, which rrows light and power, practically unhited, from Niagara Falls.

Besides its electrical attractions, the n-American Exposition will possess in turesque group at the west end of the garden—are connected by arcades and so arranged as to enclose in front a semicircular court. The Horticultural Building, which is in the centre of the group, covers an area of 45,000 square feet; the Graphic Arts and Forestry Buildings each cover 30,000. These figures indicate the magnificent scope of the whole. The central lantern, crowning the Agricultural Building, the deeply recessed arch entrances, the ornate windows, and the graceful domes make this group a very beautiful one.

The Plaza, which is an extensive open square at the north end of the grounds, has been so named because of the Spanish characteristics of the buildings bounding it on three sides. The centre of this square is occupied by a slightly raised terrace, in the centre of which is a sunken garden, where the band stand will be erected. The electrical tower is south of the Plaza, outside, and at the north is the railway and trolley station, from which the greater number of visitors will enter the grounds. On the west is a large building which is to be used as a restaurant; on the east is another closely resembling the restaurant and serving as an entrance to the stadium or Athletic Field. Much attention will be given to the stadium; in a general way it resembles that erected at Athens a few years ago. It will accommodate about 25,000 spectators.

Toward carrying out this purpose, the Government ard, created by Congress, has made ovision for including in the Governnt representation exhibits from Porto Ico, Hawaii and the Philippine Islands. e Exposition authorities on their part omise to spare neither effort nor exnse to make this "New Possessions" ature conspicuous and intensely intering. Adequate provision will also be ade for a splendid exhibit from Cuba d the adjacent islands. All the nations d colonies of the New World have been formally invited by our National Government to participate in the Exposition. The State of New York has extended similar courtesies to all the States in the Union; and, judging from the manner in which nations, colonies and States have accepted, the display will be fully as representative as its projectors have hoped for, d its benefits correspondingly large.

The best architectural talent of the untry has been employed in the proiction of a number of magnificent buildgs. The Machinery and Transportaon Buildings form a hollow square, with cades on all sides; and in the centre a urt 100 by 200 feet, adorned by a foun-in, a long pool, shrubs and flowers. The neral style of these buildings is Span-, and in many respects will remind the holder of the old missions of Mexico d California.

The plans for the Government's Philippine exhibit demand special mention. The islands themselves are to be shown in a carefully constructed miniature relief model; and men, women and children of the native races are to be reproduced in life-size plaster-casts; typical huts, occupations, etc., will also be presented. After the exposition the collection will be placed in the National Museum. Col. F. F. Hilder, an expert ethnologist, has been sent to the archipelago to secure the necessary photographs, data and specimens for the collection, and he may return with living representatives of the various tribes. The exposition authorities are considering the feasibility of having a general congress of primitive races, including Filipinos, Hawaiians, and North and South Americans, for a feature of the fair.

The scheme of illumination for the two hundred and fifty acres included in the Exposition area is on a magnificent scale. In the great court of fountains over 100,000 incandescent lamps are to be employed, and the Grand Canal encircling the grounds will be a girdle of light. Gala Water, the picturesque park lake in the centre of a natural amphitheatre of verdure-clad hills, affords opportunity for novel floating effects. From a niche in the electrical tower, a waterfall, like a shower of glittering jewels, will drop from a height of seventy feet. Another fountain design for the tower is a cascade of rainbow hues rippling around beautiful allegorical figures until it finds rest in the great basin at the foot of the tower.

Among the principal officers of the exposition are: Director-General, William I. Buchanan; Director of Works, Newcomb Carlton; Commissioner-General, John B. Weber; Acting Auditor, Henry E. Grant; Director of Concessions, F. W. Taylor; President of Board of Directors, John G. Milburn.

An Invalid's Companions

OLNEY, ILL.

Dear Editor:—I have long desired to write you an expression of my appreciation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I have read it for the past five years. I have been an invalid for nearly thirty years, and for the past five years unable to leave my bed, much of that time suffering extreme pain. My constant companions have been the blessed Bible and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. These have come into my chamber as rays of sunshine, dispelling much of the gloom and sadness that otherwise would have settled about me.

I am now seventy years of age, with probably only a short time more to spend here; but when I shall have pushed off into the beyond, I trust that my children and friends will each enjoy your paper as I have done.

Yours in Christ, MRS. WM. H. HILL.

The Happy City

There's a wonderful story that's often been told
Of a Saviour in glory—the same as of old—
Who stoops to save sinners, their hearts to renew;
Who from bondage delivers: I know this is true.
There's a heaven prepared for you and for me;
Its flowers are fadeless and crystal its sea;
Its walls are of jasper, its streets are of gold,
Its gates are of pearl, its riches untold;
It charmeth the soul with its music divine;
The night as the day in that city doth shine—
For its light is the Saviour, its law is but love,
For God is the King in that city above.

Always Open," set to music and published in a volume entitled, Sermon in Song, have helped many in deciding to accept Christ. "Answer 'Yes' to the Spirit," "In the Light of Eternity," and "Hold the Lamp of Life Aloft," (set to music by Rev. E. S. Lorenz, Mus. Doc.) are among her other popular hymns.

During the last three summers, a few weeks spent at religious assemblies at Pine Lake, Ind., and Winona Lake, Ind., have been to her seasons of great spiritual enjoyment.

In her literary work, Miss Wilson aims to have no trace of invalidism appear. She has seldom written anything relating to her helplessness; but one poem, entitled "A Memory Picture," is an exception. It refers to scenery near Miss Wilson's home, and alludes to memories of the time when she could walk.

In a letter to this journal, Miss Wilson writes:

"I have read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years. In February, 1896, one of my hymns appeared in its pages, and I also had a poem there entitled "The Palestine Lily," written on receiving a Lily of the Field from the publisher. I have never sought notoriety, but I do want to use my one talent for the Master's glory, and for no other purpose. Nearly all of my waking hours are spent in my invalid wheel-chair." The invalid poet is a tiny little bit of a woman, not more than five feet in height, and seeming still smaller in her chair; but she is all brightness and her sunny nature and gentle, intellectual face would win friends anywhere. She is a fine exemplification of the power of divine grace to illuminate a life which, without that grace, would be misery indeed. She has passed through the ordeal of suffering and come out of it a spiritualized and refined nature, and with a talent which has become a blessing. The little fragile woman, a prisoner in her wheel-chair, and who, forgetful of her own sufferings, has tuned her heart to the strains of praise and thanksgiving and Christian cheer and invitation, has all unconsciously been made the instrument to win many precious souls from sin to righteousness. The poor, obscure Indiana cripple singing so sweetly of Christ and heaven—herself hidden behind her song as the singing lark hides in the cloud—has been heard by God's people over half a continent. In one of her own verses, she voices the longing for that larger freedom which will be hers some day:

But in the land more fair than day,
From bondage free, I hope to stray
By life's pellucid river,
The sunny hills of heaven climb,
And through God's balmy summertime,
Range joyously forever.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

Consecrated Muscle

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Judges 14 : 1, ... } And Samson went down to Timnath

THERE are two sides to the character of Samson. The one phase of his life, if followed into the particulars, would administer to the grotesque and the mirthful; but there is a phase of his character fraught with lessons of solemn and eternal import. To these graver lessons we devote our sermon.

This giant no doubt in early life gave evidences of what he was to be. It is almost always so. There were two Napoleons—the boy Napoleon and the man Napoleon—but both alike; two Howards—the boy Howard and the man Howard—but both alike; two Samsons—the boy Samson and the man Samson—but both alike. This giant was no doubt the hero of the playground, and nothing could stand before his exhibitions of youthful prowess. At eighteen years of age he was betrothed to the daughter of a Philistine. Going down toward Timnath, a lion came out upon him, and, although this young giant was weaponless, he seized the monster by the long mane and shook him as a hungry hound shakes a March hare, and made his bones crack, and left him by the wayside bleeding under the smiting of his fist and the grinding heft of his heel.

There he stands, looming up above other men, a mountain of flesh, his arms bunched with muscle that can lift the gate of a city, taking an attitude defiant of everything. His hair had never been cut, and it rolled down in seven great plaits over his shoulders, adding to his bulk, fierceness, and terror. The Philistines want to conquer him, and therefore they must find out where the secret of his strength lies.

There is an evil woman living in the valley of Sorek by the name of Delilah. They appoint her the agent in the case. The Philistines are secreted in the same building, and then Delilah goes to work and coaxes Samson to tell what is the secret of his strength. "Well," he says, "If you should take seven green withes such as they fasten wild beasts with and put them around me, I should be perfectly powerless." So she binds him with the seven green withes. Then she claps her hands and says: "They come—the Philistines!" and he walks out as though there were no impediment. She coaxes him again, and says: "Now tell me the secret of this great strength?" and he replies: "If you should take some ropes that have never been used and tie me with them I should be just like other men." She ties him with the ropes, claps her hands and shouts: "They come—the Philistines!" He walks out as easily as he did before—not a single obstruction. She coaxes him again, and he says: "Now, if you should take these seven long plaits of hair, and by this house-loom weave them into a web, I could not get away." So the house-loom is rolled up, and the shuttle flies backward and forward and the long plaits of hair are woven into a web. Then she claps her hands, and says: "They come—the Philistines!" He walks out as easily as he did before, dragging a part of the loom with him.

But after awhile she persuades him to tell the truth. He says: "If you should take a razor or shears and cut off this long hair, I should be powerless and in the hands of my enemies." Samson sleeps, and that she may not wake him up during the process of shearing, help is called in. You know that the barbers of the East have such a skilful way of manipulating the head to this very day that, instead of waking up a sleeping man, they will put a man wide awake sound asleep. I hear the blades of the shears grinding against each other, and I see the long locks falling off. The shears or razor accomplishes what green withes and new ropes and house-loom could not do. Suddenly she claps her hands, and says: "The Philistines be upon thee, Samson!" He rouses up with a struggle, but his strength is all gone. He is in the hands of his enemies.

I hear the groan of the giant as they take his eyes out, and then I see him staggering on in his blindness, feeling his way as he goes on toward Gaza. The prison door is open, and the giant is thrust in. He sits down and puts his hands on the mill-crank, which, with exhausting horizontal motion, goes day after day, week after week, month after month—work, work, work! The consternation of the world in captivity, his locks shorn, his eyes punctured, grinding corn in Gaza!

First of all, behold in this giant of the text that physical power is not always an index of moral power. He was a huge man—the lion found it out, and the three thousand men whom he slew found it out; yet he was the subject of petty revenges and out-gianted by low passion. I am far from throwing any discredit upon physical stamina. There are those who seem to have great admiration for delicacy and sickliness of constitution. I never could see any glory in weak nerves or sick headache. Whatever effort in our day is made to make the men and women more robust should have the favor of every good citizen as well as of every Christian. Gymnastics may be positively religious.

Good people sometimes ascribe to a wicked heart what they ought to ascribe to a slow liver. The body and the soul are such near neighbors that they often catch each other's diseases. Those who never saw a sick day, and who, like Hercules, show the giant in the cradle, have more to answer for than those who are the subjects of life-long infirmities. He who can lift twice as much as you can, and walk twice as far, and work twice as long, will have a double account to meet in the judgment.

How often it is that you do not find physical energy indicative of spiritual power! If a clear head is worth more than one dizzy with perpetual vertigo—if muscles with the play of health in them are worth more than those drawn up in chronic "rheumatics"—if an eye quick to catch passing objects is better than one with vision dim and uncertain—then God will require of us efficiency just in proportion to what he has given us. Physical energy ought to be a type of moral power. We ought to have as good digestion of truth as we have capacity to assimilate food. Our spiritual hearing ought to be as good as our physical hearing. Our spiritual taste ought to be as clear as our tongue. Samsons in body, we ought to be giants in moral power.

But while you find a great many men who realize that they ought to use their money aright, and use their intelligence aright, how few men you find aware of the fact that they ought to use their physical organism aright! With every thump of the heart there is something saying, "Work! work!" and, lest we should complain that we have no tools to work with, God gives us our hands and feet, with every knuckle, and with every joint, and with every muscle saying to us, "Lay hold and do something."

But how often it is that men with physical strength do not serve Christ! They are like a ship full manned and full rigged, capable of vast tonnage, able to endure all stress of weather, yet swinging idly at the docks, when these men ought to be crossing and recrossing the great ocean of human suffering and sin with God's supplies of mercy. How often it is that physical strength is used in doing positive damage, or in luxurious ease, when, with sleeves rolled up and bronzed bosom, fearless of the shafts of opposition, it ought to be laying hold with all its might, and tugging away to lift up this sunken wreck of a world.

It is a most shameful fact that much of the business of the church and of the world must be done by those comparatively invalid. Richard Baxter, by reason of his diseases, all his days sitting in the door of the tomb, yet writing more than a hundred volumes, and sending out an influence for God that will endure as long as the Saints' Everlasting Rest. Edward Payson, never knowing a well day, yet how he preached, and how he wrote, helping thousands of dying souls like himself to swim in a sea of glory! And Robert M'Cheyne, a walking skeleton, yet you know what he did in Dundee, and how he shook Scotland with zeal for God. Philip Doddridge, advised by his friends, because of his illness, not to enter the ministry, yet you know what he did for the "Rise and Progress of Religion" in the Church and in the world.

Wilberforce was told by his doctors that he could not live a fortnight, yet at that very time entering upon philanthropic enterprises that demanded the greatest endurance and persistence. Robert Hall, suffering excruciations, so that often in his pulpit while preaching he would stop and lie down on a sofa, then getting up again to preach about heaven until the glories of the celestial city dropped on the multitude, doing more work, perhaps, than almost any well man in his day.

Oh, how often it is that men with great physical endurance are not as great in moral and spiritual stature! While there are achievements for those who are bent all their days with sickness—achievements of patience, achievements of Christian endurance—I call upon men of health, men of muscle, men of nerve, men of physical power, to devote themselves to the Lord. Giants in body, you ought to be giants in soul.

Behold also, in the story of my text, illustration of the fact of the damage that strength can do if it be misguided. It seems to me that this man spent a great deal of his time in doing evil—this Samson of my text. To pay a bet which he had lost by the guessing of his riddle he robs and kills thirty people. He was not only gigantic in strength, but gigantic in mischief, and a type of those men in all ages of the world who, powerful in body or mind, or any faculty of social position or wealth, have used their strength for iniquitous purposes.

It is not the small, weak men of the day who do the damage. These small men who go swearing and loafing about your stores and shops and banking houses, assailing Christ and the Bible and the Church—they do not do the damage. They have no influence. They are vermin that you crush with your foot. But it is the giants of the day, the misguided giants, giants in physical power, or giants in mental acumen, or giants in social position, or giants in wealth, who do the damage. The men with sharp pens that stab religion and throw their poison all through our literature; the men who use the power of wealth to sanction iniquity, and bribe justice, and make truth and honor bow to their golden sceptre. Misguided giants—look out for them! In the middle and latter part of the last century no doubt there were thousands of men in Paris and Edinburgh and London who hated God and blasphemed the name of the Almighty; but they did but little mischief—they were small men, insignificant men. Yet there were giants in those days. Who can calculate the soul-havoc of a Rousseau, going on with a very enthusiasm of iniquity, with fiery imagination seizing upon all the impulsive natures of his day? or David Hume, who employed his life as a spider employs its summer, in spinning out silken webs to trap the unwary? or Voltaire, the most learned man of his day, marshaling a great host of sceptics, and leading them out in the dark land of infidelity? or Gibbon, who showed an uncontrollable grudge against religion in his history of one of the most fascinating periods of the world's existence—the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire—a book in which, with all the splendors of his genius, he magnified the errors of Christian disciples, while, with a sparseness of notice that never can be forgiven, he treated of the Christian heroes of whom the world was not worthy?

Oh, men of stout physical health, men of great mental stature, men of high soc position, men of great power of any so I want you to understand your power, a I want you to know that that power c voted to God will be a crown on earth, you typical of a crown in heaven; b misguided, bedraggled in sin, admin trative of evil, God will thunder agai you with his condemnation in the d when millionaire and pauper, master a slave, king and subject, shall stand si by side in the judgment, and mone bags, and judicial ermine, and royal ro shall be riven with the lightnings.

Behold, also, how a giant may be sla of a woman. Delilah started the train circumstances that pulled down t temple of Dagon about Samson's ea And tens of thousands of giants ha gone down to death and hell through t same fascinations. It seems to me th it is high time that pulpit and platfor and printing press speak out against t impurities of modern society. Fastic ousness and Prudery say: "Better n speak—you will rouse up adverse cri cism; you will make worse what y want to make better; better deal in gl tering generalities; the subject is too de cate for polite ears." But there comes voice from heaven overpowering t mincing sentimentalities of the day, sa ing: "Cry aloud, spare not, lift up t voice like a trumpet, and show my peop their trangressions and the house Jacob their sins."

The trouble is that when people wri or speak upon this theme they are apt cover it up with the graces of belles-lettr so that the crime is made attractive i stead of repulsive. Lord Byron, in D Juan, adorns this crime until it smiles li a May queen. Michelet, the great Frenc writer, covers it up with bewitching rhe oric until it glows like the rising sun, whe it ought to be made loathsome as a smal pox hospital. There are to-day influenc abroad which, if unresisted by the pulp and the printing-press, will turn our mo ern cities into Sodoms and Gomorrah fit only for the storm of fire and brimsto that whelmed the cities of the plain.

You who are seated in your Christia homes, compassed by moral and religiou restraints, do not realize the gulf iniquity that bounds you on the nort and the south and the east and the wes While I speak there are tens of thousanc of men and women going over the awfu plunge of an impure life; and while I c to God for mercy upon their souls, I ca upon you to marshal in the defense your homes, your church and your natio There is a banqueting hall that you hav never heard described. You know all abou the feast of Ahasuerus, where a thousan lords sat. You know all about Belshazzar carousal, where the blood of the murdere king spurted into the faces of the ba queters. You may know of the scene riot and wassail, where there was set b fore Esopus one dish of food that cos $400,000. But I speak now of a differer banqueting hall. Its roof is fretted wit fire. Its floor is tesselated with fire. It chalices are chased with fire. Its song i a song of fire. Its walls are buttresses fire. Solomon refers to it when he says "Her guests are in the depths of hell."

Our American communities are suffe ing from the Gospel of Free Loveism which, thirty years ago, was preached o the platform and in some of the churche of this country. I charge upon Fre Loveism that it has blighted innumerabl homes, and that it has sent innumerabl souls to ruin. Free Loveism is bestial it is worse—it is infernal! It has fu nished this land with many thousands o divorces annually. In one county in th State of Indiana it furnished eleven d vorces in one day before dinner. It ha roused up elopements, north, south, east and west. You can hardly take up paper but you read of an elopement. A far as I can understand the doctrine o Free Loveism it is this: That every ma ought to have somebody else's wife, an every wife somebody else's husband They do not like our Christian organiza tion of society, and I wish they would a elope, the wretches of one sex taking th wretches of the other, and start to-morro morning for the great Sahara Desert, un til the simoon shall sweep seven feet o sand all over them, and not one passin caravan for the next five hundred year bring back one miserable bone of thei carcasses! Free Loveism! It is th double-distilled extract of nux vomica atsbone, and adder's tongue. Never until ociety goes back to the old Bible, and ears its eulogy of purity and its anathema f uncleanness—never until then will this vil be extirpated.

Behold also in this giant of the text and n the giant of our own century that great hysical power must crumble and expire. he Samson of the text long ago went way. He fought the lion. He fought ne Philistines. He could fight anything, ut death was too much for him. He ay have required a longer grave and a roader grave; but the tomb nevertheless as his terminus.

If, then, we are to be compelled to o out of this world, where are we to go ? This body and soul must soon art. What shall be the destiny of the ormer I know—dust to dust. But what hall be the destiny of the latter? Shall rise into the companionship of the hite-robed, whose sins Christ has slain? r will it go down among the unbelieving, ho tried to gain the world and save their ouls, but were swindled out of both? Blessed be God, we have a Champion! He is so styled in the Bible: A Champion ho has conquered death and hell, and e is ready to fight all our battles from he first to the last. "Who is this that ometh up from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, mighty to save?" If e follow in the wake of that Champion eath has no power and the grave no victory. The worst man trusting in him hall have his dying pangs alleviated and is future illumined.

In the light of this subject I want to all your attention to a fact which may ot have been rightly considered, and hat is the fact that we must be brought nto judgment for the employment of our hysical organism. Shoulder, brain, hand, oot—we must answer in judgment for he use we have made of them. Have hey been used for the elevation of society r for its depression? In proportion as ur arm is strong and our step elastic will ur account at last be intensified. Thouands of sermons are preached to invads. I preach this sermon to stout men nd healthful women. We must give to God an account for the right use of this hysical organism. These invalids have omparatively little to account for, perhaps. They could not lift twenty pounds. hey could not walk half a mile without sitting down to rest. Yet how much nany of them accomplish. O men of he strong arm and the stout heart, what se are you making of your physical orces? Will you be able to stand the est of that day when we must answer for he use of every talent, whether it were a hysical energy, or a mental acumen, or spiritual power?

The day approaches, and I see one who n this world was an invalid, and as she tands before the throne of God to nswer she says: "I was sick all my days. had but very little strength, but I did s well as I could in being kind to those who were more sick and more suffering." And Christ will say, "Well done, faithful ervant."

I said to an old Scotch minister, who vas one of the best friends I ever had: "Doctor, did you ever know Robert Pollock, the Scotch poet, who wrote The Course of Time? "Oh, yes," he replied, "I knew him well; I was his classmate." And then the doctor went on to ell me how that the writing of The Course of Time exhausted the health of Pollock, and he expired. It seems as if o man could have such a glimpse of the day for which all other days were made s Robert Pollock had, and long survive hat glimpse. In the description of that day he says, among other things:

Begin the woe, ye woods, and tell it to the doleful winds,
And doleful winds wail to the howling hills,
And howling hills mourn to the dismal vales,
And dismal vales sigh to the sorrowing brooks,
And sorrowing brooks weep to the weeping stream,
And weeping stream awake the groaning deep;
Ye heavens, great archway of the universe, put sack-cloth on;
And ocean, robe thyself in garb of widowhood,
And gather all thy waves into a groan, and utter it.
Long, loud, deep, piercing, dolorous, immense.
The occasion asks it, Nature dies, and angels come to lay her in her grave.

What Robert Pollock saw in poetic dream, you and I will see in positive reality—the judgment! the judgment!

The Gospel on Our Frontiers

The American Sunday School Union's Work—Schools Organized in a Sawmill, a Blacksmith Shop and a Log Cabin

THE chapters which make up a year's record in the life of a missionary of the American Sunday School Union are often as full of interest as those of the good story book which the children as well as the grown folks love to read around the family fireside in the long winter evenings. The tale is one of earnest, patient endeavor; of difficulties overcome, of hardships endured; sometimes, of dangers encountered, and finally of conquest over all these things as evidenced in the establishment of Sunday Schools and churches in places where these had not been before the missionary came; or the rebuilding of some house of worship that had fallen into decay through the waning interest in holy things of the little isolated, struggling community in which it was set.

REV. J. M. HARTLEY

The incidents given below (and recently related in this office by Rev. J. M. Hartley, who has been connected with the American Sunday School Union for eight years; and who, in the past year, has established some fourteen Sunday Schools in communities where there were none) are typical of the life and labors of hundreds of devoted missionaries sent out by the organization, and will appeal to our readers who are not unfamiliar with the history of the Union and its efforts for the extension of the Master s kingdom. The territory in which Mr. Hartley is working—chiefly Southern Illinois—is historic missionary ground. "Old Stephen Paxson," the father of Dr. Paxson, worked many years in that section—for forty years in connection with the Union—and he started over 1,300 schools, numbering 80,000 members, including children and teachers. It must not be understood that the conditions described are characteristic of all Southern Illinois. Mr. Hartley's business was to seek out the spiritually destitute in the section, and he found them poor in purse also, but ready to generously offer their labor and their means as soon as their interest was awakened and their judgment was convinced.

SUNDAY SCHOOL IN A SAWMILL

One of our pictures shows a sawmill, in which Mr. Hartley organized a Sunday School in a village of 150 inhabitants, where there was not, nor ever had been, a church or Sunday School. The public school directors had been asked to lend the schoolhouse for religious services, but declined; so the little band met every Sunday in the upper story of the sawmill, bringing the boards in to serve as seats and taking them out at night, so as not to interfere with the week-day industry. When winter came the weather was so cold that meetings had to be adjourned until warm days should come again. Last spring, when Mr. Hartley went back, he found that the sawmill had changed hands, and that he could not get the use of it for another term. But the people said they wanted their Sunday School, and that is how the chapel pictured on this page came to be built. The people were very poor; they had little money to give; they told the missionary they would give their labor and such things as they had. One man donated the timber and boards; others went and cut the timber into saw-logs; still others brought their wagons and teams and hauled the logs to the mill. The owners of the mill gave the use of the mill one day free of charge. Everybody helped; the missionary himself worked with the men hauling saw-logs. The total cost in money of timbers for the frame work was $1. Among them all they raised enough money to buy windows, doors, and siding for the outside. Last summer there was service in the chapel, and a very proud and happy congregation it was.

Some of the methods employed by Mr. Hartley for the purpose of enlisting interest in his work are amusing. In one place he cradled wheat for an hour to induce a man to come and hear him preach for an hour. The man was impressed with the clever way in which "the parson" swung his scythe, and faithfully performed his part of the obligation and became one of the missionary's most useful lieutenants. The first Sunday Mr. Hartley preached in that neighborhood he had a large audience. The children were all barefoot, and so were all the men, except three who were escorting their sweethearts.

"What shall we call this Sunday School?" the missionary asked his people of a Sunday School which he had organized in a log cabin which had been used for a "country cross-roads saloon," where hard cider was kept. "We will call it 'New Hope,'" said the grateful women, whose husbands and sons had been in the habit of going to this place to drink. The man who once kept the saloon is assistant superintendent of the Sunday School, and the people expect to build a church this summer.

An abandoned blacksmith shop housed another little band of Bible students until the directors of the public school gave use of the schoolhouse. In one community the church was falling into ruins; nobody preached in it; nobody went to it until the missionary came; now, the songs of Zion are heard within its walls; Bible students meet within every Sunday; and the building shows revival of reverent care.

Four months after organizing a Sunday School in a village where none existed before his coming, Mr. Hartley returned on a visit. When he entered, he noticed that the people were sitting around in groups, very quietly, and looking very sad. They told him that a little girl, the niece of the superintendent, was very ill. The missionary recalled her at once as a bright little maid, very anxious to secure one of the Bibles which he was offering as prizes for faithful attendance. The people told him she had never missed a Sabbath until stricken with the fever, of which she was sick. He found her in delirium talking about the Bible and singing snatches of the Gospel songs she had learned. "Safe in the Arms of Jesus," her favorite, she tried to sing just before passing away. Within a few weeks after her death, there were fourteen conversions at this place; among them the father and mother of the little maid who had died singing Gospel songs.

Rev. E. P. Bancroft, Secretary of the American Sunday School Union, 158 Fifth Avenue, New York City, will answer any inquiries that may be addressed to him concerning the Union's work.

THE CHAPEL WHICH GREW OUT OF THE SAWMILL SCHOOL

Indian Tribes of Central Brazil

Last summer, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave a brief account of the journeyings of George R. Witte in Central Brazil, and voiced his plea in behalf of the numerous tribes of Indians in that region, who as yet remain untouched by the Gospel, as there is not a single Missionary Society represented throughout the Amazon valley, a territory as large as that of the United States, east of the Rocky Mountains. As a result of the publicity given to the subject, the work instituted by the pioneer party on the Rio Tocantins will be continued under the care of a Missionary Committee in Liverpool, England, and an additional missionary has already been sent to reinforce Dr. and Mrs. Graham, whom Mr. Witte left at Carolina station, about eight degrees south of the equator and 450 miles from the Atlantic coast. His own return to the field for a time seemed very problematical, owing to a lack of funds, but lately the Foreign Board of the Presbyterian Church has been enabled, through a special gift of a missionary friend in Pennsylvania, to add the Amazon valley to its other fields of missionary activity, and Mr. Witte has been commissioned to return to Brazil to institute a school for Indian youth on one of the tributaries of the greatest river in the world. The proposed school will be modeled after the school at Carlisle, Pa., where over one hundred Indians are being trained for the duties of Christian citizenship. Of these quite a number become qualified instructors and missionary teachers among the Indians of the far West. Major Pratt, of Carlisle, has offered to give to Mr. Witte the best qualified Indian graduate of his school, if money for his support can be raised.

Any reader of this journal who desires to have a share in practically aiding the work or make inquiries concerning it can address Mr. Witte, care of the Presbyterian Board, 156 Fifth ave., New York City.

Jesus at Nazareth

Rejected by His Own Townspeople

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR FEBRUARY 25th. LUKE 4: 16-30

WHERE? When? Who? What? Why? Those are the picks with which to open up every Bible mine, whether for personal study or for teaching," said Uncle Will when this story had been read at the Sabbath evening round table of the Cross Roads farmers. "The first line answers our Where? 'He came to Nazareth,' not to some great and holy place, but to one that was low and lowly. Nazareth is from the same root as 'branch,' a term often applied by the prophets to the Messiah, and suggesting his lowliness. The New Testament quotes as a composite photograph of many prophecies, rather than the conscious word of any one prophet. 'He shall be called a Nazarene.' Meek and lowly himself, it is to the meek and lowly he comes."

HIS HOME

"As to When," said Ruth, the Quakeress, "I find it was fifteen months after his baptism that he thus came back in the power of the Spirit to his townspeople—in April of the year 28. How little is recorded of that first year of obscurity! And what little we know of it after his baptism and temptation is all given by John, who had adopted the mother of Jesus and taken her to his home before he wrote his Gospel. No wonder he gives us the very 'heart of Christ' in his history! Not his mother, but his Spirit dwells with us to bear witness of him."

"Where he had been brought up reminds us," said Mrs. Isaacs, the Jewess, "that the people to whom he speaks in this story are the neighbors of his youth. They had opportunities now to become more than neighbors, or to show themselves less. This opportunity Jesus brings to every door."

The Church-going Habit of Jesus

"I note," said Sanders, the Scotchman, "that 'as was his custom, he went into the synagogue on the Sabbath day'—how useful are such good habits that become second nature! If anybody ever lived that did not need public worship it was Jesus, but he went regularly, not so much to hear a man preach as to meet God and worship with his people."

Mr. Isaacs: "That Jesus should have been asked to read the Scriptures that day was in accordance with the Jewish custom, of which Paul made so much afterwards, to invite any eminent visitor to take this part in the service. Jesus had become a famous rabbi, and so on his return to his own town was invited to the synagogue pulpit. The 'book' from which he read was a parchment roll of Isaiah, in which he quickly turned to the 61st chapter, a poetic and prophetic interpretation of the year of Jubilee. It is absolutely essential that we should know the history of the Jubilee, the gospel of Moses, in order to understand the gospel built on it by Isaiah and Christ. This Jubilee year was the consummation of the Jewish Sabbatic system, which included a seventh day, a seventh year, and a series of seven weeks of years, followed by the Jubilee in the fiftieth year. (Lev. 25: 8-17, 23-55; 27: 16-25; Numb. 34: 4.) The whole system was a divine mitigation of the wrongs which the poor suffered at the hands of rulers and masters. God insisted that the workman must have the seventh day for rest, and other benefits in the seventh year, and still greater labor reforms in the fiftieth year. To every one who had lost land or liberty it was restored in this glad year. It began with the day of atonement, but no special religious ceremonies peculiar to this year were appointed. It was rather to be distinguished by that consummation of religion, the righting of social wrongs."

"The Jubilee year began," said Uncle Will, "with justification, but went on to justice, as every Christian life should. So the poetic and prophetic interpretation of the Jubilee which Isaiah wrote and Jesus is fulfilling, begins with 'the Spirit of the Lord' and goes on to blind asylums, prison reform and emancipation, a splendid instance of faith and works on a large scale."

"When Jesus declared the good news that light and liberty would come through him to the blind, bruised, bound and broken-hearted, it was not alone an allegory of his coming to a sin-blinded soul, but an advance history of Europe's regeneration in the Christian centuries. Let us read this gospel of Moses, Isaiah and Christ once more, and from the Revision:

"He hath sent me to proclaim release to the captives
And recovery of sight to the blind,
To set at liberty them that are bruised,
To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord.

"What does that mean? That's what it means. For one thing, emancipation of slaves; that, through the outworking of 'the Spirit of the Lord' in the hearts of men, swept slavery from all Christian nations in the middle third of this nineteenth century."

"That settles it," said Selah Brown. "I used to think these words of Jesus were only a picture of a soul's conversion; but as I was reading a book on the Christian centuries the other day, the thought flashed over me that all the betterments in the condition of the poor in Christian countries are a part of the good news Jesus proclaimed at Nazareth. Tom and I have worked it into a blackboard tree. The Gospel seed is a soul saved by the atoning cross and 'the Spirit of the Lord,' but the fruit-laden tree is Christian civilization."

"Those seven fruitful branches are well selected," said Uncle Will," for not one of those words is used by any writer in ancient pagan Europe or modern heathen Asia in the sense we use them. Let me try my hand on the other side of your blackboard in outlining themes for a missionary review or celebration of the nineteen Christian centuries."

"I heard a missionary from India," said Mrs. Uncle Will, "enumerate one hundred cruel customs, such as throwing children to the Ganges and burning widows on the funeral pyres of their husbands, that the British Government has abolished one by one in India, with the aid of missionary sentiment. The same has been done in Europe, only the story is not so fresh but it can be found in Ulhom's books and Gesta Christi and Lecky's History of European Morals. Europe's regeneration seems to me the supreme miracle of Christ—the supreme evidence of Christianity. If European progress is all due to material forces of evolution and the lapse of time, why is the Asiatic civilization to-day, in the treatment of the poor and weak, just where Europe was when Christ came?"

How are women and the children better off in Christian lands than in ancient pagan Europe and in modern heathen Asia? And how are the business customs and the pleasures and the politics nobler?

Mrs. Uncle Will: "Dr. S. L. Baldwin tells a story which places heathenism and Christianity in striking contrast. He, with two friends, had started on an inland missionary tour in China. They came presently to a wide river and hailed a boatman. When they were in the midst of the stream, they discovered a large jar floating in the river. Dr. Baldwin asked the boatman to row up to it. The boatman could not be induced to go near enough for them to get possession of the jar, until at last they threatened to throw him overboard. When the jar was secured, it was found to contain a girl baby, who had been put in the jar as an offering to the river god. She was taken out and carried back by Dr. Baldwin over many weary miles to his home, and left with Mrs. Baldwin. Adopted into the home, she was brought up a Christian, and became herself a teacher and missionary among her people.

"Among the Romans, girls and feeble boys and all unwelcome children, even among the wealthy, were laid at the Lactarian column to meet any fate that might await them.

"They were sometimes taken and maimed for beggars. They were often sold for slaves. They were sometimes killed, that their brains and marrow might be made into medicine. When the Christian Church became dominant in the person of the Emperor Constantine, orphan asylums were founded, and a marble vessel was placed at each church, into which children could be placed instead of being 'exposed' at the Lactarian column. These foundlings in the marble vessels were taken and reared as Christians.

"In the words of Ulhom: 'To children the Gospel first gave their rights. In antiquity, they were beyond the pale of the laws. A father could dispose of his children at will. If he did not wish to rear them, he could abandon or kill them. The law of the twelve tables expressly awarded to him this right. Plato and Aristotle approved of parents abandoning weak and sickly children, whom they were unable to support or who could not be of use to the state. Whoever picked up a child who had been deserted could dispose of it and treat it as a slave. The father's power over his children was limitless; life and death were at his disposal. Christianity, on the contrary, taught parents that their children were a gift of God, a pledge intrusted to them for which they were responsible to him."

"Here is a sentence in point," said Tom Brown, from Jefferson, who is often counted an infidel: 'I have always said, and always will say, that the studious perusal of the sacred volume will make better citizens, better fathers, and better husbands.'"

"That brings us back to the individual," said Professor Houston, of the Theological Seminary, who had preached that morning in the neighboring city and had been brought home by Mr. Sanders, whose preacher son had been his pupil. "I am old-fashioned enough to stick to Wesley's spiritual and personal interpretation of the Jubilee and of what Isaiah wrote about it and Jesus adopted:

The year of Jubilee is come;
Return, ye ransomed sinners, home.

A Soul's Emancipation

"Here is the outline of my sermon on this Nazareth gospel. I used the blackboard some when I was a Sabbath School missionary and will borrow a corner this time.

First, I show that the unregenerate soul is spiritually blind. Instance Nicodemus' misunderstanding of what Jesus said of the new birth, and the woman of Samaria's like remark about the living water. Second, I show that an unregenerate soul is bruised, wound with sins. How the devil tore the demo boy (Mark 9: 20-22) and how sin wounds l and soul to-day! And how many hearts it broken, especially hearts of mothers wh sons have sinned! Third, I show how sinful soul is a captive—no chains like th of sin, whether the sin be appetite, gree lust. Many are bound with all three of t iron links.

Good news	to the light	blind,
healing	broken-hearted
liberty	bruised bound

"Turning to the other side I show how coming of Jesus to the Nazareth of a si soul, brings first, light; the light of spiri vision and of joy; second, healing, mak whole, that is, holy; third, liberty. Th the great word of the Jubilee, and in its foundest meaning liberty is the consumma of the religious life. Spiritual liberty is t God's will as Christ did, not as a duty bu a delight. 'Perfect freedom is perfect ob ence to perfect law.'"

"May I interpose there," said Mrs. U Will, "that profound saying of George M Donald: 'When God's will is our law we but a kind of noble slaves, but when His is our will then are we his free children.'"

"That," said Uncle Will, "is the only personal liberty, and on that blazing b ground, what prodigals and politicians cal that name, is seen to be its black oppo personal slavery. Young men refuse to the pledge lest they should 'sign away t liberty,' when a 'pledge,' properly underst is but a declaration of independence, as famous declaration itself closed with 'pledge' of 'lives and fortunes and sa honor.' The transformed man who has will to do ill is free indeed. We can do w we like, when we like to do what is just."

Freedom to reject Christ

"I cannot forget that free is an elevator which takes u heaven or hell, according a say, 'Up' or 'Down.' The story of the re tion of Jesus, often as I h read it, makes my heart a for him and for them. W he had read the Bible wo standing, as was the custom honor the book as from G and resumed his seat for own exposition, how gracio they all listened as he s 'This day is this Scripture filled,' implying that in his c ing as Messiah the fulfillm of the prophecy began. T he replied divinely to their spoken thoughts, such as th This is the carpenter and su he cannot be Messiah? W does he not fill our town w miracles as he did Capernau He reminded how in every a prophet is unappreciated his neighbors. Then he sh that God works where he w with the widow alone in Sare with Naaman only in Syria.'

"The way those referen to Gentiles turned that wors ing audience into a lynch mob in an instant," said P fessor Houston, "reminds of the sudden changes fr calm to storm on Galilee. the truth we need to learn that in cherishing race hatr we always reject him who said: 'Inasm as ye have done it unto one of the leas these, my brethren, ye have done it unto m We 'thrust him out of the city' when join race mobs or race wars or even race cries, talking sneeringly of 'sheenies,' 'dago' 'niggers' and the like."

"Do you think immigration restrictio unchristian?" asked Tom Brown.

"Not if it is rejection based on charac rather than race," answered the profes "and based on the principle of saving o selves from the self-destruction of corrupt companions. If our country is to be a ref for the oppressed it must preserve its purit

"As we read of Christ's rejection," s Uncle Will, "we recall how he 'closed book' in his reading from Isaiah at a com He proclaimed 'the acceptable year of Lord,' but forbore to speak of what reject were later told about in loving warning, ' day of vengeance of our God.' We are free was Nazareth, to choose between that and light and liberty Christ brings to our hea door. If we hate and reject him because offends our prejudices we shall not hurt h who can pass through the mob unscathed, we shall hurt ourselves eternally in banish him from our hearts and so exiling our hea from heaven. 'Jesus of Nazareth pass by.' Every unsaved heart must dec whether this shall be the year of acceptan a true year of our Lord, in which he shall to us Lord of years, of days, of moments. time and of eternity. I cannot better cl than in that noblest poem, by Coletta Ry in The Coming Age for December:

Great God is Near

God is trying to speak with me and I am trying hear;
But the angry roar of an angry sea
Has told my soul that it is not free;
And my strange, imperfect ear
Has only caught, on the breast of day,
The strain of a song that is far away—
So I sit and listen and humbly pray,
For God is near.

Christ's People in America Respond to the Appeal of the Missionaries for Help

DR. ANNA GORDON AND HER HELPER

DR. GORDON'S MEDICAL CONVEYANCE

FAMINE ORPHANS MAKING BRICKS

GIRLS RESCUED IN THE FAMINE

IS announced in this journal last week, the receipt of contributions to the fund for the relief of the sufferers in the Indian famine was so encouraging that Dr. Klopsch felt justified in cabling ten thousand dollars to India. The money was sent to Bishop J. M. Thoburn, who was chairman of the Inter-Denominational Committee in the famine of 1897. This committee, being made up of missionaries of all denominations, has exceptional facilities for ertaining which districts are in the greatest need, and it must be said to the honor the missionaries that their concern is always that the neediest districts should be ieved first, regardless of the denomination of the missionary laboring there, who uld have the pleasant duty of distributing it. It has been recommended to the mmittee that one thousand dollars each should be sent to Rev. L. Gates, of Sholapur; v. H. Bissell, of Ahmednagar; Rev. W. O. Ballantine, of Rahuri; Rev. M. B. ller, of Bombay; Rev. J. F. Holcomb, of Jhansi; Dr. J. C. Ewing, of Lahore, and v. I. B. Bawa, of Roha, and three thousand to the three Methodist missionaries ho are in the greatest need of help in relief work.

The prompt response of our readers to the appeal of the missionaries is very grati-ing. It shows that Christ's people have his spirit and, like him, have "compassion the multitude because they have nothing to eat." Every contribution means a life olonged for some famishing man, woman or child. It means, too, an object lesson r the people to whom our missionaries have been preaching. There is no native hose pangs of hunger are assuaged by the food these contributions are purchasing, t must be impressed by the fact that strangers ten thousand miles away are send-g him food and must ask himself why they do it. He learns the motive from the issionaries who distribute the food. Many a heart, hitherto closed against the Gos-l, will have its prejudices removed when the story is told of the love of Christ, which s sent them not only food for the body, but the news of the Bread of Life whereof if a man eat he shall live forever." It would be well if every missionary India could set such an object lesson before the people who are dying of hunger. he need is very urgent. Every mail brings news of some other district that has llen under the grip of the famine and some other missionary whose heart is wrung day after day by witnessing suffering that he is unable to relieve. Emaciated mothers carrying children wailing in the pangs of hunger, is a heart-rending spectacle and it is not surprising that the missionaries plead for help that they may give the people food.

Rev. H. J. Bruce, the American Board's missionary at Satara, who is now home on furlough, called last week at this office to plead the cause of the suffering people. "I was in India," he said, "three years ago when the funds from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers came, and I had the joy of distributing a share of them. I want to tell you how much good was done. One result was the rescue of fifteen starving children, most of whom remained with us and are now being fed and taught in our schools. Several have been baptized and promise to become useful members of Christ's kingdom. The present famine is worse in many respects than the former one and the need is very urgent. Unless help reaches them speedily the number of deaths from starvation will be appalling. The missionaries will gladly distribute all the help that can be sent."

Rev. E. M. Gordon and his wife, Dr. Anna Gordon, who distributed a portion of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund three years ago, have written from their station at Mungeli confirming the reports of suffering from the famine. Mr. Gordon sends the photographs published on this page. That on the left is a portrait of Mrs. Gordon, who is a medical missionary. With her is her assistant in her hospital—a Christian native who is intelligently helping in her work. The second picture represents the doctor setting out on a visit to a village where patients are waiting for treatment. The third picture is a group of boys who, through the gifts of our readers, Mr. Gordon was able to rescue from starvation. They are now learning the art of brick-making. The picture on the right is of three orphan girls also rescued from the famine. All of these are now Christians, and the one in the centre has already made herself useful in carrying the Gospel into the homes of women whom she knows.

It has not been possible to include in the following list the later contributions received, but those will be acknowledged in an early issue:

Cheerful Old Age

DO not be fretted because you have come to spectacles. While glasses look premature on a young man's nose, they are an adornment to an octogenarian's face. Beside that, when your eyesight is poor, you miss seeing a great many unpleasant things that we youngsters are obliged to look at. Do not be worried because your ear is becoming dull. In that way you escape being bored with many of the foolish things that are said. If the gates of sound keep out some of the music, they also keep out much of the discord. If the hair be getting thin, it takes less time to comb it, and then it is not all the time falling down over your eyes; or if it be getting white, we think that color is quite as respectable as any other; that is the color of the snow, and of the blossoms, and of the clouds, and of angelic habiliments. Do not worry because the time comes on when you must go into the next world. It is only a better room, with finer pictures, brighter society, and sweeter music. Robert MacCheyne, and John Knox, and Harriet Newell, and Mrs. Hemans, and John Milton, and Martin Luther will be good enough company for the most of us. The corn-stacks standing in the fields do not sigh dismally when the huskers leap over the fence, and, throwing their arms around the stack, swing it to the ground. It is only to take the golden ear from the husk. Death to the aged Christian is only husking time, and then the load goes in from the frosts to the garner.

Our congratulations to those who are nearly done with the nuisances of this world. Give your staff to your little grandson to ride horse on. You are going to be young again, and you will have no need of crutches. May the clouds around the setting sun be golden, and such as to lead the "weather-wise" to prophesy a clear morning.

Own Your Home

ONE of the safeguards of this country is that so many people own the houses they live in. It is people who own nothing themselves who advocate universal smash up. They want everything to go to pieces so they can pick up some of the wreck. By so much as men own property do they become conservative. In our country becoming a freeholder is often a step toward virtuous citizenship. My counsel is to all young married persons to plan for the purchase of a home as soon as that be practicable. Toil for that though you toil for twenty years. What you have been flinging away in frivolity, put into a homestead. The attempt to secure a home has saved many young people for both worlds. It lead them into a sobriety and a practicality which helps one's morals, as well as his finances. Do not make the mistake of so many that you must wait until you get a great home. Many people in the early part of their life have had more happiness in a house with four rooms than they have in later life had in the house they built with twenty rooms. Luxuriant table cannot give appetite, nor embroidered canopy produce sleep, nor imperial divan yield quiet. It does not so much depend upon the style of house as upon the disposition you take into it. The house in which the peace of God reigns is well furnished. A cradle on one side the house, and grandfather's arm-chair on the other side the house, an altar between, and the house is well balanced.

Freshness

GIVE us more spice in our family newspaper. We meet in our daily walks so much that is depressing. Give us in our family newspaper whole bundles of spice; jokes that you can understand without laborious explanation, conundrums, quips and quirks, harmless satire, caricatures of the world's foibles, and looking-glasses in which to see our failings. Yes, give place occasionally to the much-abused pun. Those only despise the pun who cannot make one. Take the quill, and, after you have made the split in it, sharpen it down till the point is keen enough to puncture the toughest inconsistency. Let the sheet be fresh and healthy, in it the smell of cedar and new-cut grass. Let us hear in the rhythm of some of the sentences the moan of an untraveled wood and the sweep of the wing of a partridge. Instead of the artificial dye of stale imagery crush against the printed leaf a bunch of huckleberries and sumach. We are tired out with all this about the nightingale; for pity's sake, catch for us a brown thresher, and let us hear a hen cluck. Instead of riding Bucephalus to death, halter that sorrel colt. Talk not so much to us about frankincense to the neglect of pennyroyal and brook mint.

Congratulation

WAGES and salary are going up, and that always makes contentment among the working classes. We shall not hear much more of strikes. Employers, encouraged by quickened trade, will increase compensation, and men of toil, finding at home better wardrobe and richer table and more comforts, will be thankful. What a relief it is that our business men have changed their tune. Fewer croakers now than in any time for many years. Prosperity built upon successive years of magnificent harvest, and on long lessons of economy learned in a bitter school. But woe to the land if, with our returning trade, there come not new appreciation of divine favor, new institutions of mercy, and new consecration to the right and the good and the Christian. National wealth is national ruin if God be forgotten, and the population unrestrained. Societies have been formed advocating putting the name of God in the Constitution of the United States: but more than that we want God in the store, God in the factory, God in the shop, God in the street, God in the house.

Side by side with our national thrift let there go religious prosperity, and this land by the Pilgrim Fathers and the Huguenots and the Hollanders dedicated to the Lord, be held for his glory by their grateful, industrious and worshipful descendants.

The Peril to Liberia

IT has seemed to us a mistake that the United States has not sought to be more to Liberia. A republican State, with necessary affiliations with this nation, a foothold for influence on the great continent to which the world's eye is now turned; a possible factor in the future of the Afro-American, it would be very natural for this country to take great interest in her welfare.

It is said now that England and France are both scheming to get a portion there; that in the Cameroons, two-thirds of the firms are German, and that poor Liberia is destined to speedy absorption. We wonder if, with our great strides to the Orient, we are likely to forget Liberia. Perhaps a little experience in continental administration of affairs may encourage us to lend a helping hand there. We certainly cannot be indifferent to what happens in Liberia. Is this republic, modeled after the American, with many ex-American citizens, worthy of the attention of what she might almost regard as the Mother Country?

Aunt Samantha .. Delights Them

MERRIAM, KAN.

Dear Editor:—I am so glad you publish the serial articles of Aunt Samantha. They are so homelike, so full of good cheer, and, still better, so instructive in their moral teaching. We like THE CHRISTIAN HERALD so much and patiently wait for its appearance.

MRS. E. S.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.

To the dear Christian Herald:—I had the pleasure of meeting Miss Holley several times last summer at Thousand Islands and also on the New Westminster, the little steamer that plies between the Park and Alexandria Bay, and everywhere I met her she proved herself a most charming woman—a woman with a sunny disposition and generous heart, one whose presence is a loving benediction. I said to her that I did not have the rare privilege of going to the World's Fair, but that I considered reading her book the next best thing. And now I am having the opportunity of going around the world with Aunt Samantha and a vast multitude of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers. I am sure I shall read the story with greater interest for having met Miss Holley. CHARLOTTE E. GRAVES.

ELKHART, IND.

Dear Editor:—I love Aunt Samantha for her kindness to Mr. Roberts, helping him to a seat. Bless her dear heart! Like the rest of your readers I am enjoying the trip around the world with Aunt Samantha. I thank you for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The paper is both interesting and instructive and I esteem it next to my Bible. E. S. S.

LACELLE, IA.

Dear Christian Herald—I want to congratulate you on securing such an able writer as Miss Holley. We always liked the deep vein of meaning that runs through her stories, and I know we shall enjoy this "Trip Around the World." MRS. V. P. ROBERTS.

RICHMOND, Va.

Dear Editor: I have been so much "taken" with "Samantha in Mormon Land" in the last CHRISTIAN HERALD, that I am induced to request the favor to let me know (if you can) where and at what cost I could get Samantha Allen at the World's Fair—a book I have heard so much of. R. W. ELSOM.

ANOKA, Minn.

To the Editor: I do not want to miss any of Miss Holley's story. I took THE CHRISTIAN HERALD principally to get Samantha.

JACKSON, MICH.

Dear Editor—I have known Miss Holley a number of years and can truly say she is one of the most devoted Christian workers I know. At her own expense, nearly, she cares for a Sunday School near where she resides, in northern New York. C. M. GIDDINGS.

YSOHAQUI, N. B., Can.

Editor Christian Herald:—I think Miss Holley's works have as good an influence on the world as T. De Witt Talmage's sermons. Greater praise than that is needless.

DUNCAN B.

JOHN RUSKIN .. .. As I Saw Him

THAT monarch of the world's literatur has passed out, and passed up, and th best appreciation of him now begin: He scolded a good deal in his las years, but his health was poor, and that is a excuse for some cynicism. The sentence co tains more happiness than I can easily mak people understand when I say that I saw Joh Ruskin. I wanted to see him more than an other man, crowned or uncrowned. He ha done more for elevated literature than an man of the century. When I was in Englan at other times, Mr. Ruskin was always absen or sick, but this time I found him. I was vis iting the lake districts of England—the en chanted ground trodden by Wordsworth an Walter Scott and Coleridge and Mrs. Heman I visited the house where Christopher Nortl (Professor Wilson) spent his summers. went into the room where De Quincy at opium and wrote for all the world. I talke with people who remembered Wordsworth and saw Christopher North row across Win dermere and take herculean exercise among the hills.

One afternoon I took a ride that will b forever memorable. I said, "Drive out to Mr Ruskin's place," which was some eight mile away. The landlord from whom I got the conveyance said, "You will not be able to see Mr. Ruskin. No one sees him or has seen him for years." Well, I have a way of keep ing on when I start. After an hour and a half of a delightful ride, we entered the gate of Mr. Ruskin's home. The door of the vine covered, picturesque house was open and I stood in the hallway. Handing my card to a servant I said I wished to see Mr. Ruskin. The reply was, "Mr. Ruskin is not in, and he never sees any one." Disappointed, I turned back took the carriage and went down the road. I said to the driver, "Do you know Mr. Ruskin when you see him?" "Yes," said he, "but I have not seen him for years. I drove for him a good while." We rode on a few moments when the driver cried out to me, "There he comes now." In a minute we had arrived to where Mr. Ruskin was walking toward us. I alighted and he greeted me with a quiet manner and a genial smile.

He looked like a great man worn out. Beard full and tangled. Soft hat drawn down over his forehead. Signs of physical weakness, with determination not to show it. His valet walked beside him ready to help or direct his steps. He deprecated any remarks appreciatory of his wondrous services. He had the appearance of one whose work is completely done and is waiting for the time to start homeward. He was in appearance more like myself than any person I ever saw, and if I should live to his age the likeness would be complete. I could easily understand how the first time I saw Dr. John Brown, the Edinburgh essayist, he greeted me with the exclamation: "There comes my friend, John Ruskin."

Now that he is gone the whole world wakes up to speak words of gratitude and praise which it denied him all through the years in which he was laboriously writing Modern Painters, The Seven Lamps of Architecture, The Stones of Venice, and The Ethics of the Dust. We cannot imagine what the world's literature would have been if Thomas Carlyle and John Ruskin had never entered it. The day or night a man intelligently meets Mr. Ruskin's works starts a new era in his history. The selections from his writings which I picked up in Wynkoop's store, Syracuse, N. Y., in the early years of my ministry, I shall never forget. I read that book under the trees—the best place to read it. He was the first competent interpreter of the language of leaves, of clouds, of rivers, of lakes, of seas. He did for the hitherto untranslated hieroglyphics of the natural world what Champollion did for Egyptian hieroglyphics. Blessed the day when I read the first chapter of John Ruskin's books! Blessed the beautiful day when he took my hand and put upon me his benediction!

A Source of Happiness

BRATTLEBORO, VT.

Editor Christian Herald:—No paper I have ever read I enjoy as I do THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I wish it were in every home in the world. We like "Aunt Samantha" very much. The good old woman! If all married people had the true love for each other that is shown in this story, what a happy world this might be! Why cannot people see the vein of meaning in such a story, reading, as it were, between the lines? MRS. H. B. LARKIN.

The Situation in South Africa

ONE supreme effort to relieve the garrison at Ladysmith appears to be impending, but up to the close of the week ending February 3 authoritative statement had been made of the British plan of campaign. There were rumors—which the general position of the forces appeared to confirm—that the advance would be made in a triangular form, with Gen. Buller's line on the south side of the Tugela as the base of e triangle. It was indeed stated by ewspaper correspondents that Gen. Kitgener had started from the extreme east that line by a north-westerly route, hich would bring him to the beleaguered rrison without coming in contact with y insurmountable obstacles. Simultaously, it was reported, that an advance uld be made from the west in a northsterly direction. The result of these ovements, if they are actually king place, will be known obably by the middle of the nth. The depression in Engld occasioned by the evacuaon of Spion Kop, described in s column last week, has been mewhat relieved by a dispatch om Gen. Buller, showing that fault attached to the officer o ordered the retreat. Gen. oodgate had been severely unded in leading the column the top of the hill, and was capable of further command. e is a distinguished officer who s seen service in several wars, d has won many medals for very and skill. When he fell, e command devolved on Col. ornеycroft, who is praised by n. Buller for his discretion in andoning an untenable posi n and for the ability he disyed in conducting the retreat. cannot, however, be denied at a serious blunder was comtted in assaulting the hill—a nder which cost the British ny valuable lives. It is now actically admitted that the nduct of the war on the Briti side has been a mistaken e, and that even the position cupied by Gen. White at dysmith was unwise. It has embarssed the leaders, and the necessity for ieving him has involved a disarrangeent of plans, besides disasters humiliatig to British pride. The Boers, too, pear to have suffered heavily and their tories have been won at a terrible exnditure of life. Both sides by this time ubtless regret entering on the conflict, d have need to turn to him whom both knowledge to be their God, beseeching m to send a speedy end to the horrible tchery.

Child's Characteristics

A summary of a forthcoming report of of. A. McDonald, of the Bureau of lucation, is published by the New York erald. It gives the results of a series of scientific tests applied to an enormous number of children. One of the tests was that of placing a baby before a mirror daily. At first the baby took no interest in the reflection. Afterwards he showed fear of it. Later, he grasped at it with his hands. Not until he was about a year old did he look behind it to find out whether the baby he saw in the mirror was there. All the babies on whom the test was made acted in the same way. Another test was to determine the relative proportion of eye-mindedness and ear-mindedness. That is to find out whether a child was most impressed by a word he saw in a book, or by a word spoken in his hearing. A third test was as to fear. After reducing all of the replies to a table it was found that the highest number of the children examined on the question, feared thunder storms; the next highest, reptiles. Then follow, in order, according to the number fearing them, strangers, darkness, fire, death, domestic animals, disease, wild animals, water, insects and ghosts. Girls exceeded boys in fear of all the things except high places and strangers. The fear of rats and mice was seventy-five per cent. in girls to thirteen in boys. Fear in boys diminished after attaining the fifteenth year, while in girls no diminution occurs until the eighteenth year. The report will contain a number of other interesting details and will doubtless form the basis of a more enlightened system of education than that now pursued. We should have been better able to judge of the prospects if the author could have told us in his chapter on fear, what proportion of the children had that loving fear, of which the wise king spoke:

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge (Prov. 1:7).

Perilous Fumigation

Honolulu, in the Hawaiian Islands, has had a narrow escape from destruction by fire. The Bubonic plague has made its appearance in the town in a singularly malignant form. Of twenty-two cases reported, every one had terminated fatally. With only one exception, all the victims lived in the Asiatic quarter of the town, and that exception was a girl who lived a short distance away and made frequent visits to the infected region. All the houses in the quarter are wretched wooden shanties, with no pretense to sanitary conditions. It was determined by the authorities that the only way to check the spread of the pestilence was to burn the houses in which deaths had occurred. The furniture and personal effects of the inmates were taken outside the town and thoroughly fumigated. The people were removed to two camps, where they were kept under medical observation until the period of incubation had passed. During their absence fire was set to their dwellings, while the fire department saturated the adjoining houses to prevent their taking fire. In the latter work they were not entirely successful. The fire spread from one house to another, until it was beyond control. It seemed for some hours as if nothing could save the town, but eventually the fire was checked. There is always this danger in taking heroic measures to remedy an evil, that they may do a great deal of harm as well as good. We have the assurance, however, which is very comforting in trouble, that when God adopts such methods for the purification of the soul that he has them under perfect control and will never allow them to consume more than is necessary to his purpose.

And of some have compassion making a difference; and others save with fear, pulling them out of the fire. (Jude 22, 23).

The Tragedy in Kentucky

Deplorable from every standpoint is the crime in which the political ferment in Kentucky has reached its consummation. No patriotic citizen in the whole country could have heard the news that William Goebel had been shot, without deep regret. It was a barbarous crime, repugnant to every man, whatsoever his political party, who has the best interests of his country at heart. The passions in which it originated had their beginning in the State Convention last fall, when Goebel was nominated Democratic candidate for the governorship. There were complaints at that time of the methods he had adopted to secure his nomination, and another convention of Democrats assembled and nominated an Independent candidate. The result of this division of the Democratic party was, that on the polling day, the Republican candidate received a larger number of votes than either of his opponents. His plurality over Goebel was about 2,300. But Goebel had previously introduced a bill in the Legislature, which had been passed, providing for a system of counting the votes in an election, which practically placed the results in the power of the legislature. After the election, Goebel claimed that there had been irregularities in many districts, which had given Republican majorities, and that on a fair count he would be declared elected. During the contest that ensued, and while the Board appointed by the legislature was considering Goebel's claim, a large number of armed men came into the city from outlying districts, ostensibly to see that there was fair play. There was fear then that there would be a conflict and possibly a riotous outbreak. On Jan. 30, as Goebel was crossing the State House yard, on his way to the Senate chamber, a shot was fired and he fell headlong. The assassin, determined to make sure of his work, fired four more shots. Goebel was still living when his friends went to his assistance, but he was so severely wounded that on Feb. 3 he died. It is significant that only five years ago Goebel himself shot down a political opponent. It is possible that some relative or friend of the man thus murdered may have fired the shot which ended Goebel's life. But if not, and if the murder was political, it is plainly in line with the victim's own methods, showing that the Bible prophecy is still in force:

They that take the sword shall perish with the sword (Matt. 26:52).

A STREET IN HONOLULU, HAWAII

BRIEF NOTES

Mr. Christian Phildius, on behalf of the Central International Y. M. C.-A. Committee at Geneva, has completed a fifty-five days' tour through Austria, and has formed during this visit no fewer than twenty new Associations.

A remarkable example of the power of Christ to save the very worst is that of Archie Sloss, a Salvation Army convert, who died recently, after leading a consistent Christian life for eleven years. Before his conversion he had been in jail many times, some of them for long terms. Forty years of his life had been spent in all within prison walls.

An illustration of the value of temperance in encouraging habits of thrift, is found in the reports of three large estates in England. The owners will not permit any building on their land to be used as a saloon. Their losses by non-payment of rent from their tenants are less than one-eighth of one per cent.

Rev. William E Needham has resigned his pastorate in Brooklyn to devote himself entirely to evangelistic work. He has been holding successful meetings at Greenport, N. Y., and at Rutherford, N. J. Mr. Phillips Hall, the business man evangelist, is anxious to join forces with Mr. Needham and it is possible that they may co-operate. Mr. Needham's address is 465 Summer Ave. Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dr. W. W. Eddy, for more than forty-eight years a missionary in Syria, died at Beyrout on January 29. He went out originally under the American Board, but of late years has labored under Presbyterian auspices. With Dr. H. H. Jessup, he took an active part in founding the Theological Seminary at Beyrout. He was the author of several valuable text-books, and wrote an excellent commentary in Syrian on the New Testament. He was seventy-four years of age.

Dr. F. E. Clark and Mrs. Clark, who have sailed for the Orient, expect to spend a month in Japan, going thence to China, where they will attend the Convention of Christian Endeavorers at Foochow on April 4. They will visit Korea and return by the new imperial railroad across Siberia, reaching London in time to attend the World's Convention in London in July.

An interesting story of church building is told by a correspondent of the Advance. He says that when the Congregational Church of Fort Scott, Kans., was burned some time ago, the church bell was badly cracked by its fall. The pastor had a large number of little bells made out of the fragments and sold them for the benefit of the re-building fund. They realized over five thousand dollars with which the present building was erected.

Dr. Lardner, the famous writer on scientific subjects, and Prof. Augustus De Morgan, the eminent mathematician and logician, are both on record as to the beginning of the century. In books written by them they refer to the question discussed in the year 1800 and show that the new century did not begin until the close of that year. Prof. De Morgan had investigated the works of Dionysius Exiguus, whose calculations are the basis of our chronology before writing. It follows therefore that the twentieth century, according to these authorities, does not begin until Jan. 1, 1901.

Around the World with Josiah Allen's Wife

Samantha Meets a Queen

AT last after seven days stiddy sailin' a little spec wuz seen in the distance one mornin' gradually growin' in size, and other little specks wuz sighted, also growin' gradual, and at last they turned to solid land rising up out of the blue water, clad in strange and beautiful verdure behind the white foamin' billers of surf. And instinctively as we looked on't I broke out singin' onbeknown to me, and Josiah jined in in deep base:

Sweet fields beyend the swellin' flood
Stand dressed in livin' green.

We sung it to Balermy. Josiah hain't much of a singer, and my voice hain't what it once wuz, but I d'no as in any conference meetin' that him ever sounded sweeter to me, or I sung it with more of the sperit.

How beautiful wuz the shore as we approached it, its scenery different from Jonesville scenery, but yet worth seein'—yes, indeed! Mountain and valley, rock and green velvet verdure, tall palm trees shadin' kinder low houses, but still beautiful and attractive. And what beautiful colors greeted our weary eyes as we drew nigher. I thought of that gate of Jerusalem the Golden, all enameled with emerald, amethyst, chalcedony, and pearl sot in gold. The golden brown earth made from melted lava, the feathery foliage of the palms that riz up beyend the dazzlin' white beach, the crystal blue waters with myriad-hued fishes playing down in its crystal depths. Oh how fair the seen as we approached nearer and see plainer and plainer the pictured beauty of the shore. Shinin' green valley, emerald-topped mountain, amethyst sea; which wuz the most beautiful it wuz hard to say.

The Islands of the Sea

Evangeline Noble stood off by herself leanin' on the rail of the deck as if she see through the beauty into the inner heart of things, and see in her mind's eye all the work her own people, the missionaries, had done there. The thought that they had taken the natives like diamonds incrusted in dirt and cleansed them of the blackest of their habits. She see in the past natives burying their children alive, putting to death the mentally weak, worshiping horrible idols, killing and eating their enemies, etc., etc. But now under the blessed light of the torch, that long procession of martyrs had held up, the former things wuz passin' away and she, too, wuz one of that blessed host of God's helpers. She looked riz up and radiant as if she see way beyend the islands of the sea and all she hoped to do for her Master on earth, and as if he wuz talking to her now, teaching her his will.

Nigher to us Elder Wessel wuz standing, and he sez, lifting up his eyes to Heaven:

"Oh islands of the sea! where every prospect pleases and only man is vile."

And Arvilly hearn him and snapped out, "I d'no as they're so very vile till traders and other civilized folks teach 'em to drink and cheat and tear round." His eyes lost in a minute that heavenly expression they had wore and sez he:

"Oh, Sister Arvilly, surely you think it is wrong to kill and eat each other up and etcetery."

"Well, I d'no," sez she, "but I'd ruther be killed to once by a club and eat up and be done with, than to die by inches as wimmen do under our civilized American license laws. The savages kill their enemies, but the American savage kills the one that loves him best, and has to see her children turned into brutes and ruffians, under what is called a Christian dispensation. There hain't no hypocrisy and Phariseeism in a good straight club death, and most likely whilst he wuz eatin' me up he wouldn't pose before foreign nations as a reformer and civilizer of the world."

"Oh, Sister Arvilly," sez he, "think of the hideous idols they worship! You can't approve of that," sez he.

But Arvilly, the ondanted, went on, "Well I never see or hearn of any savage idol to compare in hegiousness with the Whiskey Power that is built up and pampered and worshiped by Americans rich and poor, high and low, Church and State. Let anyone make a move to tear that idol down from its altar, made of dead men's bones, and see what a flutter there is in the camp, how new laws are made and old laws shoved aside, and Griggses are called in, and new laws are fixed over, and the highest and the lowest will lie and cringe and drag themselves on their knees in front of it to protect it and worship it. Don't talk to me about your wood idols; they hain't nothin' to be compared to it. They stay where they're put, they don't rare round and kill their worshipers as this Whiskey idol duz. I'd think enough sight more of some men high in authority if they would buy a good clean basswood idol and put it up in the Capitol at Washington, D. C., and kneel down before it three times a day, than to do what they are doin' they wouldn't do half the hurt and God knows it, and He would advise 'em that way if they ever got nigh enough to Him so's He could speak to 'em at all."

"Oh, Sister Arvilly!" sez Elder Wessel, and he looked as if he would faint away. And I too wuz shocked to my soul, specially as Josiah whispered kinder low to me:

"Samantha, we might git a small idol whilst we're here. You know it would come handy in hayin' time and when the roads are drifted full."

I looked at him in a way that he will remember through his hull life, and sez he quick, "I shan't do nothin' of the kind unless you're willin'."

"Willin!" sez I, in heart-broken axents, "what will happen next to me?" And then indignation dried my tears before they fell and I sez, "I command you, Josiah Allen, to never speak to me on this subject agin; or think on't!" sez I fiercely.

"SEE THAT NATIVE, ARVILLY, STANDIN' UP ON THAT BOARD!"

Watching the Surf-Riders

He muttered sunthin' about thinkin' what he wuz a mindter. And I turned to Arvilly and sez, to git her mind off:

"See that native, Arvilly, standin' up on that board!"

For as our good ship bore us onward we see crowds of natives standin' up on little tottlin' boards, dartin' through the water every which way, risin' and fallin' on the waves. I couldn't done it to save my life. No, Josiah nor me couldn't stood on boards like that on our creek, to say nothin' of the Pacific ocean. But we should never have appeared in public dressed in that way—it wuzn't decen and I told Josiah I wouldn't look at 'er if I wuz in his place; I mistrusted tha some on 'em might be wimmen. An then I thought of the Garden of Eder when Adam and Eve first took the place and I didn't really know what to think But I drawed Arvilly's attention to one o 'em that seemed extra dextrious in mar agin' his board and sez, "How under th sun duz he do it, Arvilly?"

"I d'no," sez she, and she added dreamily. "I wonder if he would want a copy o the Twin Crimes, or the Wicked an Warlike. If I do sell any here to th natives it'll put some new idees in thei heads about idol worship wickeder an warliker than they ever had." Mis Meechim and Dorothy wuz approachin and Robert Strong I see looked off wit rapt eyes onto the glorious seen. And a no two can see the same things in an picture, but see the idees of their ow mind, blended in and shadin the view, I spozed that Rol ert Strong see rared up o the foreground of that er chantin' seen his ideal Cit of Justice, where giganti trusts, crushin' the people' life out, never sot its fee but love, equality and goo common sense sot on thei thrones in the middle on' and the people they rule wuz prosperous and happy And anon he looked dow into Dorothy's sweet fac as if no foreign shore or an inner vision ever looked s good to him.

Miss Meechim's Fears

Miss Meechim hated t have Dorothy see them na tives, I see she did; actin so skittish towards the mal sect always, it wuz dretfu galdin' to her to see 'em i that state and specially t have Dorothy see 'em. Sh looked awful apprehensiv towards them swimmers an board riders and then at he niece. But when she catche sight of Robert by her sid a look of warm relief swep over her anxious face, as i in her mind's eye she se Dorothy by his help walkin through the future a pros perous and contented bach eldor maid.

Tommy wuz kinder talkin to himself or to his invisibl playmate. He wonnered how he wuz goin' to git on shore wonnerin' if he could stand up on one o them little boards and if his grandpa an grandma would each have one to stan up on, and kinder lookin' forward to suc an experience I could see, and Josia wuz wonderin' how soon he could git good meat dinner. And so as on shor or sea each one wuz seein' what thei soul's eye had to see, and shakin' eve and anon their own particular skeletons and shettin' 'em up agin' in their breas closets.

Well, as we approached nigher an nigher the wharf we see men dressed in every way you could think on from petti coats to pantaloons, and men of every colo from black down through brown and yel ler to white, and wimmen the same. Well, it wuzn't long before we wuz ensconced in the comfortable tarven where we put up. Elder Wessel and his daughter and Evangeline Noble went to the same tarven, which made me glad, for I like 'em both as stars differin'. Elder Wessel I regarded more as one of the little stars in the Milky Way, but Evangeline s one of the big radiant orbs that flashed ver our heads in them tropic nights.

The tarven we went to wuz called the Hawaiian Hotel. We got good comfortble rooms, Arvilly's bein' nigh to ourn nd Dorothy's and Miss Meechim's acrost he hall and the rest of the company comortably located not fur away. Well, the ext mornin' Josiah and I with Tommy valked through some of the broad beauiful streets, lined with houses built with road verandas most covered with vines nd flowers and shaded by the most beauiful trees you ever see, tall palms with heir stems round and smooth as my rolln' pin piercin' the blue sky, and fur, fur p the long graceful leaves, thirty feet ong some on 'em. And eucalyptus and egoniea and algebora with its lovely foiage, and pepper trees and bananas and omegranates and tamarind and bread ruit and rose apples, tastin' and smellin' good deal like a rosy. And magnificent leanders and fuchias and geraniums and very other beautiful tree and blossom ou ever hearn on.

An Island Paradise

And take it with these rich colored osies and luxuriant green foliage and he white suits and hats of the men, and he gay colored clothing of the women we net, lots of them with wreaths of flowers ound their necks hangin' most to their eet, take it all together it wuz a seen ong, long to be remembered. And then we walked up on Punch Bowl Hill, five undred feet above the level of the sea, nd looked off on a broad beautiful picure of sea, mountain and valley soft and eautiful and a-bloom with verdure, and non bold and rugged and sublime, and I sez to Josiah:

"This very place where we're standin' ow wuz once a volcano and belched forth lames, and that also," sez I, pintin' to Tantalus that riz up two thousand feet. "And," sez I, "they say that the view from that is glorious."

"Well," sez he, "I guess we hadn't better climb up there; it might bust out agin. And I wouldn't have you sot fire to, Samantha, for a thousand worlds like this," (he didn't want the work to git up there, that wuz it). And I didn't argy with him, for I thought that it would be quite a pull for us to git up there and git Tommy up, and I didn't know as the child ort to climb so fur, so I didn't oppose my pardner when he proposed to go back to the tarven, and we santered back through the streets filled with citizens of all countries and dressed accordin', to the grounds around the tarven. We put Tommy into a hammock and sot down peaceful nigh by him. The sun shone down gloriously out of a clear blue sky, but we sot in the shade and so enjoyed it, the bammy air about us seemed palpitating with langrous beauty and fragrance, and I sez to my pardner:

"Don't this remind you, Josiah, of what we've heard Thomas J. read about:

'The island valley of Avileon
Where falls not rain nor hail nor any snow.'

"Where it seems always afternoon."

"NEVER SPEAK TO ME ON THIS SUBJECT AGIN"

"I d'no," sez Josiah, "as I ever hearn of such a land, I never wuz any hand to lay abed all the forenoon."

"But, Josiah, there is sunthin' so dreamy and soothin', so restful in the soft slumbrous atmosphere, it seems as if one could jest lay down in that hammock, look off onto the entrancin' beauty around, breathin' the soft balmy air, and jest lay there forever."

"I guess," sez he, "that the dinner bell would be apt to roust you out the second or third day."

But Miss Meechim jined us at jest this minute, and she sez to me, "I feel just as you do, I feel as though I would fain dwell here forever."

And Josiah sez: "I believe that it would be a good thing for you, Miss Meechim, to stay here right along; you could probable do considerable good here preachin' to the natives aginst marriage, they're pretty apt to marry too much if they're let alone, and you might curb 'em in some." (Josiah can't bear Miss Meechim, her idees on matrimony are repugnant to him.) But she didn't argy with him. She sez: "Robert is planning a trip to the Pali, and wants to know if you won't join us."

And Josiah says, "Who is Pali?"

And she sez, "It is the precipice five hundred feet high, where King Kamehameha drove off his enemies."

Well we wuz agreeable and jined the party. Robert had got a wagonette and he and Dorothy, Miss Meechim and Arvilly and Josiah and I jest filled the seats, Tommy sot in Josiah's lap or between us.

It is quite a long ride to the Pali, but we didn't realize it, because the scenery all along is so lovely and so novel. That view from the top I hain't a goin' to try to describe, nor I shan't let Josiah try; I don't like to have that man flat out in his undertakin's. Good land! do you want us to tell how many sands there wuz on the flashing white beach that stretched out milds and milds? And we might as well as to describe that enchantin' panorama and take up all the different threads of glory that lay before us and embroider 'em on language. No, you must see 'em for yourself, and then you hain't goin' to describe 'em. I d'no but Carabi could, I hearn Tommy talkin' and "wonnerin'" to him as he stood awestruck beside me, but no mortal can.

Well, I thought that there wuz two things I had to see whilst I wuz there, I must not slight 'em—one wuz the volcano Kilauea, which means the House of Everlasting Fire, and the other wuz the ex-Queen, Liliuokalani. I guess I will call her Lill for short, it is some trouble to spell her name right, let alone pronouncin' it. And I felt that I would see Queen Lill first, as she might feel more hurt than the volcano did if I didn't pay attention to her. And though a volcano busts out fearful I felt that I had ruther face its anger than that of a woman's scorn. Mr. Shakespeare sez, you know, that: "Hell hath no fury like a woman that hain't had proper attention paid to her" or words to that effect.

After a good deal of thought on the subject I concluded that I would go alone, I wouldn't take Josiah with me. I had hearn that Queen Lill wuz very susceptible to the charms of men, and though I hain't jealous and never wuz called so, and though I knew that Queen Lill wasn't nigh so fair as I wuz and am, still men are so queer you never can tell what strange idees they may take into their head, and I felt that it would be safer for me not to take him.

In Royalty's Presence

I had sent word that I wuz there and craved a augence, which wuz gladly granted. She had hearn of me and I had hearn of her, which made everything agreeable. So at the appinted hour I wended my way through her wide dooryard all sot off with tall palms, algebora and bananna trees and gorgeous with every posy that could delight the eye, and wuz ushered by one of her hired men into her presence. I liked her looks first rate; of course she hain't what you may call handsome, and her complection is pretty middlin' dark, but she has a good look and a good way with her. She came forward and greeted me with great cordiality and gin the hand I extended a warm grasp, and I hern visey versey, and sez she:

"I am glad to see you, Josiah Allen's wife." And I sez, speakin' her name as well as I could, "I also am glad to hail the Queen of the Sandwich Islands."

That tickled her and she sez: "I was not deceived in you; you are one who can recognize royalty if the cloud of adversity and trouble is wreathin' it in its black folds."

And I sez, "Clouds often covers the sun and moon, but the light is there jest the same." I felt to pity her as she went on and related her troubles to me. Her throne kicked out from under her by them that wanted to set down on it, the high chairs of her loyal friends took by her enemies who craved the soft cushions. Even her private property grabbed away from her. Why, how should any of us feel to have a neighbor walk in when we wuz havin' a family quarrel and jest clean us out of everything—kitchen stove, bureau, bed and beddin' and everything; why, it would rile us to our depths, any on us.

She sez, "I feel that my kingdom wuz stole away from me." And I sez:

"I know jest how you feel. There wuz a woodsy island down in our creek that Josiah had called hisen for years and years, rained peaceful and prosperous over so we spozed, it made a dretful handy place for our young stock to stand in the shade in the summer, and our ducks and geese jest made their hum there, but what should Bill Yerden do when he bought the old Shelmadine place but jest scoop up that island and try to prove that it wuz hisen. It wuz jest stealin', Josiah and I always felt so. But he wuz down with tizik at the time, and I wore out nussin' him, and Bill put bob iron fence round it, real sharp bobs, too, and we had to gin in. Of course it wuzn't a big spot, but we despised the idee of havin' it took from us just as much as though it wuz the hull continent of Asia and we can't git over it, Josiah nor me can't. And I know jest how you feel, and I sympathize with you."

And she sez "Sympathy is sweet, but justice is sweeter."

And I sez, "That is so, but when you can't git justice, sympathy is better than nothin'."

"Yes," sez she, "I know it, but I am lookin' forward to the day when I shall git my rights again. I am jest as much a queen as Queen Victoria is to-day, and my kingdom is just as much mine."

Sez I "That is just the way Josiah and I feel; we can't help lookin' forward to gittin' our rights, but don't spoze we ever shall, for life is short and Josiah don't want any more of our live stock tore up on them bobs; and, as I've said to Josiah many a time, Bill Yerden feels guilty, or he wouldn't rare up such sharp defences round it."

Well, we had a good deal more of jest such profitable and interestin' talk as two such great wimmen would naterally have, and we parted away from each other with a cordial hand shake and mutual good feelin'. But she called me back and sez she: "I want to give you one word of solemn warnin' before we part," and I stopped stun still and listened.

"I don't know," sez she, "as you'll ever be a queen."

"Well, mebby not," sez I, "but I am thought a sight on in Jonesville, and there is no knowin' what may happen."

"Well," sez she, "if you ever are a queen, a ruler of a kingdom, don't let any other nation protect you. P'protectin'," sez she, "has been the ruin of more than one individual and nation."

And I promised her that I would look out for it if I ever wuz a queen, and then I finished, gracefully backin' out of her presence. I like her first rate, and believe she is a likely woman; I believe she has been lied about, she jest the same as told me she had; if she wuz a woman that took in washin's for a livin' there wouldn't have been so much said about her. Why, it is jest as easy for envious folks to run them high in position and try to demean 'em as it is to fall off a log.

Our Friends in Luzon

SHALL we not think of them as friends, these people in whom, by God's providence, we have become so vitally interested in these last days? A few years ago the Philippine Islands were to our eyes only a group on the map, and we had no concern about them, nor much expectation either of ever seeing them ourselves, or sending our sons and brothers there to fight or dwell or labor. We may hope that the need for fighting will soon be over, and when war has cleared the way, that peace may come to the islanders; that schools and churches and missionaries and teachers may bring them the best fruits of American civilization. A family group in Luzon is interesting in the number of children clustered together, though these are not all brothers and sisters; some are cousins of the others, as in oriental homes it is common for brothers to reside under a single roof, their little ones growing up together as in one family, while the grandmother is the real queen of the house. These people are gentle and willing to be taught; their bright faces show intelligence, and some of the babies and the little lads and lasses are as pretty as are the children of other lands. Somehow, with brown skins, dress does not seem so essential as with white; the dark color is in itself a kind of costume, and in tropical climates the children are, happily for their own comfort, not fettered by much clothing. When a single garment, a skirt, a jacket, or a pair of trousers, composes a day's outfit for a day's fun, he is not apt to be greatly tormented by injunctions from his mother not to get spots on his clothes and cautioning him to be careful to keep out of the mud.

The great need of these people is a knowledge of Christ as their Saviour, and in the wake of that knowledge all other good things will come to them. They, like ourselves, first of all, need to hear the old, old story of Jesus and his love. A young girl of the best class from Malate, near Manila, prettily dressed, and with her beautiful hair flowing loosely over her shoulders, compares favorably with our own maidens of her age, and almost any of us might be happy and light-hearted, if allowed to jog along to market in a Philippine islander's easy-going cart, taking our time behind the sober-paced animal between the shafts.

The Quality of Enthusiasm

People are apt to connect enthusiasm with youth, limiting it as if it were a quality confined to life's earlier years. Indeed, as we grow older, many of us do grow cautious, and lose our faith in new enterprises, and our belief in persons; so that while we are standing by, looking at ways and means, and balancing the chances of success, somebody else rushes in, does the work, wins the laurels or the gold, and our opportunity is past. Many a man, lacking enthusiasm, spends his whole life in considering what to do, and ends by doing nothing whatever.

Enthusiasm is God-given fire. There are blessed souls in this world who keep this quality to the very end of their days. Allied to maturity of judgment, and to a cultivated mind, enthusiasm gives a foretaste of conquest. The enthusiastic woman or man will overcome every hindrance and surmount every obstacle.

Hospitality

When children are in the habit of meeting pleasant guests at the family table, they are broadened and helped as they cannot be in a home which exercises no hospitality. No matter how easy and gracious are the family manners as an accustomed thing, the presence of a guest gives them an added touch of suavity. Every guest tries to be entertaining. There are extra dainties on the table, and the best dishes are used, while the house all through takes on a gala air. Topics of conversation relating to the great world, to politics, to church affairs, to current events, to the pleasant gossip of kindred and acquaintances are introduced, and the children listen to and participate in the talk. Nothing can be a greater mistake than to exclude hospitality from home life, if only for the children's sake. One does not need to go to very great trouble or expense, or to spend money beyond one's means, in order to receive friends at one's board. The true art of hospitality gives the best one has, without effort or excuse, and then lets the guest fit smoothly into the grooves of the family life.

A FAMILY GROUP FROM ALBAY, LUZON

Concerning Motives

We should not be too introspective. There is no great profit in dwelling incessantly on ourselves, and the result of continual self-examination is very apt to be a morbid and unwholesome mental state. Yet, in our silent hours, we may profitably now and then look to our motives. Why were we so irritated at the casual remark of a friend? Why were we so unwilling to spare a gift for the cause our minister so ably pleaded? Why had we not greater patience under suffering?

The plain truth about most of our lapses is that we have been depending altogether on ourselves, and not seeking help from the Master. When we go to him about everything we are kept from sin, kept from falling a prey to temptation and are able to gain the victory over our natural dispositions, and are made, not by our own power, but by that of Christ, gentle, loving, strong and compassionate. We have only our own motives to think of, and never have any right to scan unfavorably those of others, or to attribute to them motives of unkindness which may have been far from their thoughts.

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—HUSBAND. Your wife is perfectly right. A man has no place in the kitchen, interfering with his wife's special business in the home.

—WINIFRED. If invited to dinner you must reply yes or no by return mail. If you accept, let only an extreme reason break such an engagement.

—LOIS. Read ten verses of your Bible daily; you can at least do that. If you will read and think over them, you will presently begin to love the Book of Books.

—A READER. Chewing gum is far from an elegant habit. Many things may be disagreeable without being sinful. Tobacco chewers have no place in polite society.

—WILLIE JANE. The first caller leaves a few moments after the second arrives. The exception is when the first lady is a very intimate friend who may be unconventional.

—PAULINA T. In going to a reception, give your card to the maid. If the door be opened by a member of the family, or if the maid does not offer you a tray for the card, leave it on a table or in the dressing-room.

—TIMOTHY W. There is no especial way in which a man proposes to the young woman he loves. You may do so by letter of course, but since you live in the same street with her, and can see her every day, why not call and receive her answer in her own words.

—MATRON. A table may be very beautifully set with all white china, and the advantage this has over other and decorated china, is that when a piece is broken, it may readily be replaced. But variety is pretty, too, and a table set with blue dishes is very charming.

—LITTLE GIRL. Never mind, dear, if your mother still considers you too young to go into society. Aunt Prudence thinks her a wise mother. You are growing older every day of your life, and you won't always be the little girl at home, which it is a lovely thing to be.

—HENRY JOHN. Apologize to the young woman. You were very rude in leaving her in anger. Her cousin had a perfect right to call on her. What will become of you if you are so jealous before marriage? The young lady may well be afraid of such a tinder-box disposition as yours.

A COMMONPLACE LETTER

IT seemed so little the thing you did—
Just to take the pen in your hand
And send the warm heart's greeting, hid
'Neath the common two cent stamp of the land—
But over the mountains and over the plain
And away o'er the billowy prairie went
The small, square letter, to soothe the pain
Of one who was fretted with discontent.

She was ill and tired; the long, hot day
Had worn itself to the merest shred;
The last of the light as it ebbed away,
Fell on her quivering needle and thread.
A shadow came flying across the space
Where the fading sunlight filtered through:
There was just the gleam of a sweet young face
And a voice said, "Here is a letter for you!"

The quick tears blurred in a sudden mist,
But she brushed them away, and then she smiled, [and kissed
And you should have seen how she kissed
The postmark, just like a little child.
Why, the name brought back the long ago
When she dressed in her best of afternoons,
When she found it a pleasure to sit and sew
And her seams were sewed to tripping tunes.

Poverty, change, and the drudgery
Of work that goes on without an end
Had fettered the heart that was light and free,
Till she'd almost forgotten she had a friend.
The people at home so seldom write;
Her youth and its pleasures lie all behind;
She was thinking bitterly but last night
That out of sight is out of mind!

Now, here is your letter! The old hills break
Beyond these levels flat and green
She thrills to the thrush as his flute notes wake
In the vesper hush of the woods serene.
She sits again in the little church,
And lifts her voice in the choir once more,
Or stoops for a four-leaved clover to search
In the grass that ripples up to the door.

It was very little it meant for you—
An hour at best when the day was done—
But the words you sent rang sweet and true,
And they carried comfort and cheer to one
Who was needing to feel a clasping hand,
And to hear the voices she used to hear;
And the little letter—the breadth of the land—
Was the carrier dove that brought home near.— MARGARET. E. SANGSTER.

THE BIG BROTHER

WHAT a world of adoration is in the eyes of the little fellow of five or six as he gazes up at his big brother, to him the concentration of everything splendid and fine. He is not afraid of anything when he is with his brother. In his heart he believes that wolves and bears would run away, and Indians take to flight, if his brother came along. In the imagination of the small boy wild animals and savages play a large part; he thinks of them, dreams of them, and perhaps hides a club under his bed, so that he may be ready for them should they attack the house in the night. But he feels perfectly certain that his big brother can rout the fiercest foes, and he himself tries to be brave, to walk, to talk, to behave like this dear being, who is somehow his ideal, nearer to him even than his dear father. If mothers are wise they will take great pains in bringing up the big brothers, beginning when they are little, of course. One's greatest care in the home training must be bestowed on the little children who come first. Once get a family well started, the older ones obedient, loving and truthful, and the smaller children will need very little discipline, for they will imitate the brothers and sisters. To have a big brother smoking cigarettes, furtively reading objectionable books and papers, using slang, or profane language, is to have in your house an example so sad and so mischief-making that your guardian angel turns away in grief at the sight.

We must impress our older boys with the thought of their responsibility to the younger ones, with the idea that they are helping us in their education, and that their unconscious influence will always be felt. When the big brother is a manly Christian, obedient to the Lord Jesus, and following him, the home is very sure to be sweet and tranquil, and the parents will have little trouble, great joy, satisfaction and pride in their children.

THE TOUCHSTONE

A NEW SERIAL STORY

BY HELEN SHIPTON

CHAPTER XVI.

Revelations

DURING the long night Caryl slept uneasily, waking at short intervals, muttering incoherently, taking reluctantly the medicine Douglas administered and then falling asleep again. Much that he said was incomprehensible to the solitary listener, but one thing he did realize and that filled his soul with unutterable joy. It was not Celia who occupied the chief place in Caryl's heart, but a certain Miss Gilchrist, whom he had met in India, and from whom it seemed he was estranged. Douglas listened intently, and had no difficulty in discovering that Caryl loved this Miss Gilchrist intensely and still longed to make her his wife.

While Caryl slept, Douglas traveled over the story of the plot which had separated him from his brother. Caryl's explanation had made it clear that there was a plot. There was no other name for it. Dora Locke, for some purpose of her own, had poisoned the mind of his uncle against him, and then had embittered Caryl's mind. What could her object be? Douglas knew of no harm that he had ever done her. He could think of nothing that could have prejudiced her against him. Why had she done this cruel thing? Well, that mystery must wait. The first thing was to have Caryl well again and then the skies would clear.

As the night wore itself away Caryl's restlessness increased. Douglas grew anxious and waited impatiently for Dr. Fosbrook's arrival. He came at last, bringing with him the nurse, as he had promised. She was an intelligent, capable woman, who took charge at once with self-reliance that inspired confidence.

"Now," said the doctor, "I must insist on your getting some rest, otherwise I shall have another patient on my hands. You may leave your brother now without any fear. He will be well cared for. He is not worse than I expected to find him; but he will have a long and tedious illness and we shall need you later. I am going to stay with him for an hour and after that the nurse will be in charge. Now go and do not let me hear of your being here again before night."

Thoroughly worn out, Douglas obeyed. He walked slowly through the village with heavy feet and downcast eyes to Highshes, and entering the house silently was going to his room. But his hospitable landlady heard him and insisted on his eating breakfast. Douglas did not know how weak and faint he was until the food and hot coffee that he took mechanically gave him new strength. Then he went up to his bed and slept heavily until night. When he awoke, he rose hurriedly, astonished at the lateness of the hour. Having dressed, he was setting out for his brother's quarters, when he noticed a bulky envelope laid where it must meet his eye. It had been brought about an hour before, he learned, and it was marked, "Important." The writing was Mrs. Locke's. Should he put it in his pocket and read it later? No; perhaps it might contain matters about which he had better speak to the writer, before seeing Caryl. He turned back into his room, broke the seal and read:

"It is to you I must explain," the letter began abruptly without date or preface. "Doubtless you and Caryl have exchanged confidences and you know now why you are poor and he is rich. You are blaming me. I should do that if I were in your place. But I want you to understand why I acted as I did. Read my confession and then if you can say, 'I forgive her,' I hope you will. By that time I shall be beyond caring whether you do or not.

"My temptation began when I saw that your uncle was failing, both in body and mind, and I foresaw the time when I should be adrift on the world again, and should have to seek such another situation among strangers. I wanted independence, and a little happiness, and I had never had either. I felt that your uncle ought to provide for me; but I knew that he had never made a will, and I did not think he ever would be persuaded to make one till it was too late. I began to consider how I might secure something for myself during his lifetime, if only by saving out of the money allowed me for housekeeping, and I tried to keep you out of the way for fear you should see what I was doing. You know how I used to tell you that he would not see you? It was not true; but I kept you away till he grew hurt and angry. Even then it did not turn out quite as I expected, for he began to harp upon the notion that you were in difficulties and were ashamed to face him. That gave me an idea, and two or three days later I told him that you had confessed to me that you were very deeply in debt. I pointed out that it would be a very bad thing for you if it was known that you had a rich uncle, ready to pay any debts you might incur. It was agreed between us at last that I was to have the money, and to settle with your creditors individually, letting each one think that he was the only one to be paid.

"In this way I secured a large sum. Your uncle fretted at your not coming to see him to thank him for helping you, and I had to keep you away. One deception involved others, and I began to suffer torture. I had constant fear of discovery. His mind was failing slowly, and I took advantage of it. One day, not long before his death, some money that he had lent on mortgage was paid in. In his weak mental condition he fretted at having to find a new investment. I reminded him that he had always promised to leave me a legacy, and I suggested that instead of doing so he should give me the money then, so as to save my paying legacy duty. The idea of saving had become stronger with him as he became old, and this suggestion pleased him. He finally wrote a check for the money and gave it to me. In his methodical way he entered the payment in his books to 'D. L.' It was exactly the same kind of entry as the former ones and nothing to distinguish it, your initials being the same as mine. I knew that when his books were examined later it would appear that this, like the other sums I have mentioned, had been given to you. In fact, when the lawyer came to make his will all the D. L. payments were added up, and the old man, surprised at the total, and vexed at your neglect of him, decided that you should have nothing more.

"Of course, I had to deceive Caryl, too, and to alienate him from you. How I did so you know by this time, but you do not know what I have suffered, nor how ashamed and utterly miserable I am. I have dwelt upon it during the past day until I am almost crazy. I must make restitution. I have sinned deeply; I have failed; you and Caryl have come together, and I can never look either of you in the face again. By the time you read this I shall be far away and shall never return. Enclosed is a check for the money that is yours by right. I have retained enough only to pay my necessary expenses."

The letter was unsigned, and the unsteady lines showed how agitated the writer had been. Douglas looked at the check. It was for a large amount, and was drawn on a London bank.

Deeply as Dora Locke had injured him, poignant as was the suffering she had caused him, Douglas pitied her. He could not bear to think of her going out penniless into the world. He went to the house where she had hired a room, intending to urge her to remain until he could consult Caryl about her future. But she had left as she said and there was no trace of her.

Arriving at the hotel, Douglas met Dr. Fosbrook leaving after a visit to his patient.

"He is doing well," the doctor said in answer to Douglas's question. "It will take time, but to-day has been no worse than I anticipated. It is to-morrow that I dread. The election will take place then, you know, and I fear he will be beaten. I dread the effect of the news upon him. Quiet is the best thing for him. If the election news were well over I should not have much fear. You are going to see him, now. Do not stay long and be very careful not to talk of anything that would excite him."

Mindful of Dr. Fosbrook's injunction, Douglas resolved to say nothing of Dora Locke's letter and made his visit brief. Caryl was evidently weak and made no effort to detain him, though the glance with which he welcomed him recalled the old days of fraternal affection.

On the following day Dr. Fosbrook's foreboding was fulfilled. The Conservative candidate was elected, but only by a small majority. Caryl heard the news with more equanimity than either Douglas or the doctor expected. "Poor Allardyce," he said, "how disappointed he will be." Of his own disappointment he said nothing, and it is likely he was prepared for the event. Indeed he seemed relieved that the election was over. Dr. Fosbrook

MAN AND WIFE

See Changes as They Change

To sweeten sour human nature, one of the best methods is to leave off coffee if it gives you dyspepsia or makes you nervous.

"I asked husband this morning to write out a testimonial for the Postum Cereal Co., and from it I quote, 'I am pleased to be able to state that my wife has been cured of sick headaches and "general cussedness" by leaving off coffee and using your Postum Food Coffee. My home is now a happy one.'

"I am forced to admit his joke contains more than a modicum of truth, for I find now I have complete control of my nerves, while formerly I was often irritable, and husband himself has been entirely cured of insomnia by leaving off coffee and taking up Postum. He sleeps now like a baby, from the time he goes to bed until morning, and perhaps his improvement is partly a reason for his seeing such an improvement in me. At any rate, our old sickness and troubles have disappeared.

"I had tried everything for my sick headaches, but as long as I stuck to the coffee, the headaches stuck to me. It took us a little while to learn that we must follow the directions in making Postum, in order to obtain a really palatable, delicious beverage. People must get over the idea that they can make it in any kind of a slipshod way and have it good. The great element in making good Postum is to allow it plenty of time to boil. That is certainly simple enough, and when the cook becomes accustomed to making Postum, one can depend upon a regular quality every morning.

"I know people who seem to be able to drink coffee, with no bad effects; and on the other hand, I know that probably one-half of all my friends are more or less unpleasantly affected with coffee, when they persist in using it, but Postum has obtained a strong hold since its qualities have become known, and a great many of our friends are steady users of Postum in place of the ordinary coffee, and you may be sure every family that has used Postum for even one month will be ready to testify to the improvement in health.

"If you should publish this letter please suppress my name, as I have a horror of undue notoriety. If any one will take the trouble to write you for my name and address, I will cheerfully answer any questions that may be asked, and furnish satisfactory evidence to substantiate my statements. Respectfully," Mrs. ———, Hyde Park, London, Can.

was delighted. "He bears it manfully," he said, "now he will mend."

It was, as the doctor predicted, a long illness, but the recovery was steady and uninterrupted. Every day Douglas spent an hour or more with his brother, and during their conversations they seemed to draw nearer together than even in the days of their boyhood.

One day, as Douglas left his brother's room, happy in the restored fraternal relations which they were both resolved nothing should again disturb, he saw a slender figure passing down the street before him. It swayed under the weight of a heavy child, who was crying bitterly, and, Douglas recognizing it, quickened his steps.

"Give me that child," he said authoritatively. "Miss Celia, you will kill yourself some day with bearing your people's burdens."

Celia resigned the big girl willingly to Douglas's strong arms and they walked on side by side to Mrs. Whitaker's cottage, which was the child's home. The old woman was not at home, but had left her door open in case of her little granddaughter coming. Celia entered and Douglas followed with the child, who had dried her tearful eyes and had forgotten her childish trouble, whatever it may have been. Celia stirred the fire and set a ruddy blaze dancing over the whitewashed walls and gaily-colored Scripture prints.

Then she sat down in the rocking-chair beside the hearth and held out her arms for the little one, and Douglas gave it to her and sat down uninvited in the chair opposite, watching with dreamy pleasure while she took off the damp little shoes and socks and warmed the bare pink toes in a matter-of-course motherly fashion.

It is not conducive to self-control to be at once very tired, very much relieved, and very happy. In that homely little room, with the dusk without and the firelight within, with Celia's sweet face half seen in the uncertain light above that little fair head that lay against her breast, Douglas forgot that he had meant to keep his love a secret for months or even years to come.

It seemed her right, since she knew so much, to know all; he had to open his inmost heart to show her how things were between himself and Caryl, how the cloud had arisen between them, and how it had been completely and forever swept away; and while he was doing that, the love that was in full possession there, came somehow naturally and inevitably to light.

It is but the first step that costs — in love-making as in all else. From thinking of love to speaking of it, from protesting that he dares not hope for a return, to pleading for a look—a word—a promise—these are steps that even a shy and humble-minded lover finds little difficulty in taking, if not very decidedly reproved. And Douglas, like most reticent passionate men, could find words enough on two or three occasions in a lifetime.

Only little Polly Whitaker knows that Miss Celia's soft warm hands were kissed, over and over again, with rapturous grateful kisses, that night beside her Grannie's fire. And she will not mention the circumstance, because she will have forgotten it before she can speak plainly enough to make the story intelligible. When Grannie Whitaker, with her elder grandchild chattering beside her, came slowly up to her cottage door, she found a young gentleman standing very upright beside it, respectfully waiting to escort "Miss Ceelie," who was putting Polly down from her knee, with cheeks made very rosy by the heat of the fire, which had blazed up with unnecessary vigor.

But as the two stepped out together into the dusk, some instinct made the old woman look long and intently after them.

"God bless her," she said half aloud. "Some one will be taking her away from us all one of these days; and I shouldn't wonder if it was him! Well! he looks like one that a woman might put confidence in; and as for her, the heart of her husband may safely trust in her, that's certain. I reckon there's no harm in saying, 'God bless them both.'"

[THE END]

THE LITTLE SOLDIERS IN YOUR BLOOD.

The part which the corpuscles of the blood play in making good the loss occasioned to the body by wear and tear, and in carrying off the effete or worn-out material, has been compared to the part played by a soldier. The corpuscles of pure blood are our soldier-friends, who repair the worn-out tissues of the body, and fight against disease-germs. The first condition for good health is pure blood, and that can only be obtained and kept by taking pure food and drink.

Adulterated food-stuffs and drinks are the pests of the modern market, and all too often health considerations are sacrificed to apparent cheapness. If you would have a pure drink, take cocoa; but let it be a pure cocoa, such as Van Houten's, which is highly digestible, extremely soluble, and of most delicious taste. It is cheap, too, for it costs less than a cent a cup.

It is easily made; it has an attractive aroma; and it contains more nourishment than an equal quantity of the best beef tea.

BE SURE YOU TRY

HE VALUE OF CHARCOAL.

ew People Know How Useful it is in Preserving Health and Beauty.

Nearly everybody knows that charcoal is he safest and most efficient disinfectant and urifier in nature, but few realize its value hen taken into the human system for the ame cleansing purpose.

Charcoal is a remedy that the more you ake of it the better, it is not a drug at all, ut simply absorbs the gases and impurities lways present in the stomach and intestines nd carries them out of the system.

Charcoal sweetens the breath after smok-ig, drinking or after eating onions and other dorous vegetables.

Charcoal effectually clears and improves he complexion, it whitens the teeth and fur-her acts as a natural and safe cathartic.

It absorbs the injurious gases which collect n the stomach and bowels; it disinfects the outh and throat from the poison of catarrh.

All druggests sell charcoal in one form or nother, but probably the best charcoal and he most for the money is in Stuart's Absorb-nt Lozenges; they are composed of the nest powdered Willow charcoal, and other armless antiseptics in tablet form or rather n the form of large, pleasant tasting lozen-es, the charcoal being mixed with honey.

The daily use of these lozenges will soon ell in a much improved condition of the eneral health, better complexion, sweeter reath and purer blood, and the beauty of it , that no possible harm can result from their ontinued use, but on the contiary great enefit.

A Buffalo physician in speaking of the enefits of charcoal, says: "I advise Stuart's bsorbent Lozenges to all patients suffering om gas in stomach and bowels, and to clear he complexion and purify the breath, mouth nd throat; I also believe the liver is greatly enefitted by the daily use of them; they cost ut twenty-five cents a box at drug stores, and lthough in some sense a patent preparation et I believe I get more and better charcoal n Stuart's Absorbent Lozenges than in any of he ordinary charcoal tablets."

Richard D. Creech, of 1062 Second St., Appleton, Wis., says.:

"Our son Willard was absolutely helpless. His lower limbs were paralyzed, and when we used electricity he could not feel it below his hips. Finally my mother, who lives in Canada, wrote advising the use of Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, and I bought some. This was when our boy had been on the stretcher for an entire year, and helpless for nine months. In six weeks after taking the pills we noticed signs of vitality in his legs, and in four months he was able to go to school. It was nothing else in the world that saved the boy than Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People."—From the Cresent, Appleton, Wis.

Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People are sold by all druggists. Price 50 cents per box; 6 boxes $2.50. Look for this trade-mark on every package.

TO look at these two photographs one would hardly credit the statement that they are portraits of the same person. Yet such is the fact. The story of this poor little Armenian orphan girl is that of hundreds of others now cared for by American benevolence. Missionary Barnum tells it briefly in the letter below:

THE CHANGE WROUGHT IN AN ARMENIAN ORPHAN

One year ago a ragged little orphan girl from the Geghi district, one hundred miles to the northeast of us, among the Anti-Taurus Mountains, appeared at our doors and begged to be taken into one of our Orphan Homes; but as we were full, we declined. Her persistence overcame our objections, and she was received. Her photograph was taken at the time. It was taken again the other day, and the two copied together. I send you one of the copies to show the change in this girl, and as an illustration of what is taking place in many others. This girl had a very sad face, but the sadness left it by degrees, till now she is a bright, happy child, doing well in her lessons, and with the promise of a useful future. We have 1,100 orphans under our care.

A Soldier Boy's Letter

In many hundreds of American homes letters are received from sons and brothers serving in Cuba, in Porto Rico and in the far Philippines. In these even the smallest detail is interesting to the readers whose loving hearts follow the soldier in all his wanderings. Mrs. S. C. R., of Adelphi, O., sends in this extract from a letter received from her son, which is doubtless typical of thousands of other epistles from the soldier boys:

They have chased Aguinaldo and his bodyguards up into the mountains, but I do not think they will catch him, as he is too slick for them.

This town (Biyambang) is a good-sized town, and you can buy almost anything you want to eat. There are a lot of Filipino restaurants here and they are pretty moderate in their prices. We were five days in Tarlac, the insurgents' capitol before we came here. I was in the hospital ten days at Tarlac with the malarial fever, but I feel fine now. It is getting dry and it must be the beginning of the end of the rainy season. I get THE CHRISTIAN HERALD right along. They come two and three at a time, and I enjoy them very much. I have nothing to wear but what is on my back. I have clothes in four different places, if I ever get them.

For breakfast we had two little slices of bacon, a coupie of hardtacks and a cup of coffee; for dinner we had a couple spoonfulls of beans, hardtack and coffee, but for supper we had eighteen chickens for the company. Eighteen chickens for one hundred men would not make them fat, you know.

"He is richest that has fewest wants." Likewise he is rich in health who purifies his blood with Hood's Sarsaparilla, guarding against attacks of fever, pneumonia, rheumatism and catarrh.

The Strength of Humility

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 25. Luke 18 : 9-14

IN teaching men how to approach God, Christ rendered a service to humanity the value of which it would be impossible to overestimate. We know so little of the Almighty, the finite mind is so little able to conceive what kind of Being he must be who made the world and upholds the universe, that when we think of coming into his presence we need to know what attitude we should take and what words we should use. In approaching an earthly sovereign, there are certain forms to be observed and certain deferential lines of conduct to be followed by any one who hopes to stand well with the potentate, or to obtain some favor from him. How much more when we enter the presence of the King of Kings and take upon ourselves to address him! In the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican, Christ gives us the instruction that we need in this matter and shows us how we ought to feel and speak when we approach God. The Publican, he says, went away "justified." That is what we all need. If we can so pray that we may be justified, we have attained the highest blessing. To be justified is to be put right, to be approved, to be accepted; and nothing better than that can come into any man's life. It places him in accord with the will of his Maker and brings him into the sphere of the highest development.

Christ puts the two men in striking contrast. The Pharisee thanks God for his blameless life, and surely that is a matter for which he had reason to be thankful. There can be no harm in that. We do well to be thankful for being kept from sin and for being preserved from falling under temptation. But if he had really been so thankful as he professed, if he had been as conscious as he pretended, that it was to God that he was indebted for the power to lead such a life, he would not have proceeded to boast of his performances, nor to disparage his neighbors. His doing so indicated a censorious spirit and a self-satisfaction inconsistent with his prayer. He apparently regards himself as perfect, as having no need of any further help. He has nothing to ask because he thinks he has already attained the highest standard possible to him. We have seen many exhibitions of this spirit in our own time and they are invariably accompanied by similar disparagement of ministers and other Christians. It is sufficient condemnation of that course to say that such people are not justified. They are not in the way of progress, they are outside the possibility of development. Far other was the spirit of Paul, who, forgetting the things that were behind and reaching to the things that were before, pressed toward the mark. Every step taken in the spiritual life is a starting point from which we are to climb to other and still better things.

Perhaps the Publican, too, had things of which he might have boasted. A man who offered his prayer would be likely to have already made some attainment in the spiritual life. At any rate, he was in a more hopeful condition. When a confession is made of faults and shortcomings, there is a better promise of progress than in boastfulness. He was conscious of imperfection, but he was in the presence of One who could impart the power to amend. His attention was fixed, not on his excellences, but on his faults. He asked for mercy. This is the beginning of all true progress. It is an admission of guilt, of unworthiness, and when a man reaches that stage that he is dissatisfied with himself and asks for lenity, there is ground for hope in regard to him. The child who comes to his father after some misconduct, asking to be forgiven, is in a more hopeful condition than the one who reminds his father of his general good conduct and excuses his fault. A child who admits his ignorance is more likely to learn than one who thinks he knows everything. So the Publican was justified, because he put himself in the attitude of a sinner needing forgiveness, and in the way of amendment by confessing his wrongdoing. He was at the beginning of the right path—the path which leads to the highest attainment.

Abbey's Salt is composed of fruit acids and saline ingredients forming an elegant, evenly granulated, effervescent tonic laxative of delightful acid flavor. It is so pleasant to the taste that even children take it eagerly.

It will prevent and relieve Constipation, Indigestion, Headache, Biliousness, Rheumatism, Gout, Fevers, Nervous Depression, Skin, Kidney and Liver Complaints. It purifies the blood and clears the complexion.

There are some people who never do anything until they have to. Don't be one of them. Take care of your health while you have it. The daily use of Abbey's Salt will keep you in good health the year 'round by keeping your stomach, liver and bowels in perfect condition.

"I am glad to say I find Abbey's Salt an excellent laxative and ant-acid. It gives good results in various forms of Dyspepsia and in Constipation. I have always thought that the effervescent salines were not half as well known and used in this country as they ought to be."—Dr. N. B. SIZER, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Abbey's Salt is put up in three sizes; the 25-cent size is the usual trial size; the 50-cent size will cure a severe case of Dyspepsia or Constipation, while the $1.00 size is purchased by those who have learned of the benefits to be derived by the daily use of this excellent preparation.

Abbey's Salt is English and was introduced into the United States last spring. It is sold in DRUG STORES only, in many cities and towns, but if your druggist has not got it yet we will mail any size, postpaid, on receipt of price of same.

FREE If you want the Calendar, but prefer to purchase Abbey's Salt from your local druggist, send us 4c. in stamps to pay postage and packing and we will send one by return mail.

THEIR VOICES RAISED FOR PEACE

A Mass Meeting in New York Favors Intervention in the Transvaal War

CARNEGIE Hall, New York, was the scene of a meeting on the evening of February 1, which possessed international interest. It was a gathering of citizens of all parties and many nationalities, for the purpose of giving expression to the desire for such action by the civilized governments as would lead to a cessation of the war in South Africa. A number of well known ministers and laymen were present and took a prominent part in the proceedings. Recently there has been some agitation in behalf of American intervention in the war; but it has been given out unofficially at Washington that there is no likelihood of our government taking any step looking to that end, unless invited to do so by both parties to the struggle, which, at the present stage of the war, is quite improbable. The Carnegie Hall meeting, however, placed the peace party on record, so far as its attitude in the South African conflict is concerned, and expressed the sentiment of the advocates of peace throughout the Union.

Mr. George W. Van Siclen, in his opening address, introducing the chairman, Rev. J. B. Remensnyder, referred sympathetically to the message of unhappiness and sorrow that comes to us from the widows and orphans of both sides in the war. Both combatants claim to be Christian nations; both ought to be urged to go to their tents and cease firing. He contended that under the provisions of the third article of the Hague Peace Conference, the President had the right to intervene and offer our services for mediation and arbitration. "The only solution of the troubles of this world," he declared, "is the application of practical Christianity."

Chairman Remensnyder made a strong plea for arbitration, as substituting reason for passion—justice for force; and preventing the awful carnage of war. He believed intervention practicable and advisable at this time. Hon. R. B. Roosevelt declared that even President Kruger longs for peace. The time has probably not yet come when it can be brought about, but it may come and soon. Let us be ready to take advantage of it.

Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, D. D., of the Broadway Tabernacle, the next speaker, believed that some honorable way should be discovered out of this costly and calamitous dispute. America should be a peacemaker among the nations.

Rabbi Pereira Mendes deprecated abuse of either of the belligerent nations. He called on all pastors to preach the doctrine of universal peace and brotherly love.

Mr. George Gluyas Mercer, of Philadelphia, also spoke. He held that the most important immediate contribution America can make to the cause of international peace is the ratification of the Hague Treaty. Despite wars and increasing armaments, the signs of a world-peace justify hopes of realizing a world-federation. It can come, however, only as nations learn that they cannot live unto themselves. We are not responsible for universal peace, but it is in our power to do some small share toward lifting our country to that high plane where that peace may be possible. The more improbable its immediate attainment the more need of labor and of hope.

Resolutions were adopted in favor of our government tendering its offices to bring about peace in South Africa by arbitration. Copies of the resolutions are to be sent to the President, to Queen Victoria, President Kruger, President Steyn and the British Peace Committee.

Cleaning Silver

Instead of scouring and rubbing each piece of silver separately, the whole service can be as effectively cleaned in a few minutes. After each meal the silver should be put into a pan (kept especially for the purpose) and cover with lukewarm water, to which a teaspoonfull of is added; set the pan on the range until the water gets to boiling point, then lift out each piece with a wire spoon and lay on a soft linen cloth, wiping quickly with chamois skin. The pieces so cleaned will be highly polished and look like new.

Wonderful Remedy for Rheumatism

DR. J. G. CONNOR, Ionia, Mich., writes:

DEAR SIRS:—An old friend of mine handed me a couple of small vials of your TARTARLITHINE some time ago and I tried it on myself, having suffered from rheumatism for several years. I assure you I was so pleased with its effects that I procured a full sized bottle, and since taking it I have been entirely free from rheumatism during the past year. FOOD IN SICKNESS

Proper Selection of Food the Sure Way to Get Well and Keep Well

"While getting over the grip, and while my stomach was so irritable I could not eat anything without distress, I found I could take a dish of Grape-Nuts with rich milk, and feel built up like I had eaten a full meal, and yet have none of the unpleasant effects of indigestion. I wish people knew its worth.

"It seems to me trained nurses and physicians could use it to such good advantage. It is really the most nourishing and easily digested food I ever tried."—Mrs. Myra J. Tuller, 1023 Troost Ave., Kansas City, Mo.

Grape-Nuts Food is now recommended by physicians all over the United States. They know it contains the delicate particles of phosphate of potash obtained from the natural grains. This is the element Nature uses with albumen of the food to build the soft gray substance in the nerve centers, brain and solar plexus, in the human body. The effect is in some ways like a stimulant, but does not wear off, for it is a natural rebuilding.

Grape-Nuts can be made into a great many different and palatable dishes. The Postum Cereal Co., Ltd., Battle Creek, Mich., the pure food manufacturers, offer to pay a reasonable sum for new and desirable recipes which may meet with their approval. Ladies are requested to experiment and send in their recipes. As an illustration: A most delicious mock pumpkin pie can be made from Grape-Nuts after the following recipe: Pour boiling water over one-half cup Grape-Nuts, let stand 10 minutes; add 2 eggs, 4 tablespoonfuls of sugar, 2 cups sweet milk, one-third teaspoon of ginger, 1 teaspoon mixed spices. Stir over slow fire until thoroughly boiled. Bake pie dough in deep pan. When done, put in prepared Grape-Nuts, return to oven and brown.

MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL USE

OXYDONOR

AFTER SUNDAY'S EXHAUSTIVE WORK

REV. HENRY L. PHILLIPS, Rector of Crucifixion Protestant Church, Philadelphia, 1422 Lombard Street, writer Oct. 21, 1899: "For colds and Rheumatism I find Oxydonor a most helpful servant. Have used it successfully in my family. As a tonic after Sunday's hard work, it is simply invaluable."

REV. R. R. ALBIN, Pastor Calvary Baptist Church, Shenandoah, Pa., writes Nov. 17, 1899: "Oxydonor wonderfully relieved me of Neuralgia, and I found it very helpful in Rheumatism. Also found Oxydonor very helpful after my Sunday's work as a preacher, by using it on that night, so that Monday morning found me refreshed. Would advise all ministers to try Oxydonor."

REV. R. R. TRAVIS, Ellenville, N. Y., writes Oct. 21, 1899: "For Insomnia and Sciatica Oxydonor proves a speedy and complete relief.

REV. THOS. J. OLIVER CURRAN, Pastor St. George's Church, 76th Street & Drexel Ave., Chicago, writes, July 8, 1899: "I have used Oxydonor on myself for Catarrh, Grippe, Fatigue and Sleeplessness. I am positive from what I know it has done for myself and others, that it will do everything Dr. Sanche claims for it.

Vital Energy

Oxydonor supplies the vital energy which prompts and supports the highest physical effort and renders possible grand mental results.

Oxydonor, in short, is Life. It is a simple instrument, which compels the body to absorb large quantities of healing, health-giving Oxygen from the air through the lungs, membranes and skin, thus transforming disease into Health and Vigorous Life.

Oxydonor will keep a family in good health, and with ordinary care it lasts a lifetime and saves the ruinous costs of sickness. Full instructions with each one.

THE FORKS OF THE ROAD

O COULD I go back to the forks of the road— [the load;
Back over the long miles I have carried
Back to the place where I had to decide,
By this sign or that sign, my footsteps to guide.

Back to the sorrow, back to the care,
Back to the place where the future was fair.
O, were I there now, decision to make,
My Father in heaven, which road would I take?

O, could I go back to the forks of the road
With the wisdom I've gathered in bearing this load,
A different decision, dear God, would I make,
And the path of the righteous my footsteps should take.

The broad road of pleasure no glory hath won,
It hath brought me to anguish—my whole life undone. [drear!
And now, at the end, Ah, 'tis wretched and
My heart is nigh breaking, I tremble with fear.

The road is so tangled with briar and thorn,
To find the way back I'm ever o'erworn;
Deep-sunk in despair I'm 'wildered and lost
Of choosing the wrong road, how bitter the cost!

If God in his mercy would show me the way
To return, to return, to the light of youth's day,
My road I would choose by the sign of the Word—.
With Jesus, my Leader, my Way and my Lord.

—MRS. CLARA T. KENNISTON.

To Help Clothe the Naked

THE growing success of the spiritual work at the Bowery Mission brings with it increasing responsibilities in the direction of caring for the hundreds and thousands of men who give evidence of a desire to live a Christian life. Homeless, they must be sheltered; famishing with hunger, they must be fed; out of work, employment must be found for them. During the month of January, 3,758 meals were given by the mission, and sleeping accommodation provided for 1,611 men, whilst untiring efforts have been made towards finding work for the unemployed. The most urgent need of all, especially during the cold winter months, is clothing. Scores of men wearily trudge the streets day after day, looking for work, and to many of them the only thing that prevents them finding it is their shabby appearance. Even unskilled men stand all the better chance of securing work if they are presentably dressed. A man in rags and tatters has but little luck. For clerks, salesmen, waiters, barbers and other kindred occupations, there must not only be an absence of rags, but a certian amount of tidiness and cleanliness. There are hundreds of men of this type now looking to the Bowery Mission for this help. What shall we say of the thousands of poor, forlorn, half-naked men that shiver and shake through the long, cold winter nights under their apologies for clothing? In many cases the first duty of the mission in the cases of men who have sought Christ in the meetings has been to send them to the hospital to be treated for pneumonia, bronchitis, and other diseases brought on through want of proper clothing. Will our readers give help in this direction by sending whatever cast-off clothing they can spare—coats, vests, trousers, overcoats, hats, shoes, underwear, shirts, stockings, etc.? All such packages should be sent, express prepaid, in care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 92 Bible House, New York, and all will be acknowledged in these columns.

You Can Play Them Without Learning

THE CHURCH CHOIR ZOBO BAND OF PATERSON, N. J. From Life Photo.

This band was organized by the church choir and Organist, Mr. W. F. Miller, as a means of raising money for Church and Missionary purposes. It was a success from the start, and has even participated in Easter Sunday service. The band is very proficient, and is now taking outside engagements. They find it a pleasant, profitable variation from routine work. Many Church Choirs have these Zobo Bands, and find them of great value. As a means of earning money for church purposes, a "Zobo Concert" invariably draws full houses. Zobo Bands can play any piece of music in all parts by ear or by note as preferred.

READ WHAT PASTORS AND ORGANISTS SAY ABOUT OUR INSTRUMENTS

Rev. H. E. Berkey, of Red Lion, Pa., says: "My Sunday School Superintendent, Mr. J. A. Miller, has called my attention to your Zobo Band Instruments, as he has some, and thinks they are just suited for our work." Miss Hattie E. Konnty, of Springfield, S. Dak., organist, choir leader, says: "Zobo instruments received, and are all right and we want more of them." Rev. James C. Mitchell, of North Easton, N. J., says: "I have just received the Zobo Cornet and I am delighted with it, will organize a band." Wm. F. Miller, organist and director of church choir of Park Ave. Baptist Church of Paterson, N. J., says: "I find the Zobo Brass Band Instruments to be first-class, and just what we needed, as we have a very small organ. We have a fourteen piece Zobo Band, and intend to enlarge it. We have had one Zobo Concert, and would say it was a complete success." Mae Blance Winfield, instructor of music at Gallaway Female College, of Searcy, Ark., says: "I am much pleased with the Zobo Band Instruments. Had we space we could quote you thousands of such letters from renowned persons who have had our goods, but we believe we have quoted enough to satisfy any reasonable person that we are perfectly reliable and that our goods are as represented.

CAN BE PLAYED BY ANY ONE WHO CAN HUM A TUNE—NO LEARNING

We do away with that long tedious labor of practice. It is the most extraordinary musical instrument ever produced. An instrument capable of almost every modulation, its music may be softened to the cooing of a dove or the thrilling song of the nightingale. The Cornet is an elegant accompaniment to Organ, Piano or any string instrument, and affords unlimited pleasure to the individual; suited for all in and outdoor entertainment. These instruments open up new possibilities to the Vocalists, and develop the vocal cords.

WITH A FULL BAND A GRAND PIPE ORGAN EFFECT CAN BE OBTAINED

Those that have no pipe organ, the Zobo supplies the want at a minimum cost. Every church without a paid choir should organize a Zobo Church Choir Band. Sing into the month piece—Zobo does the rest.

$1.00 SPECIAL OFFER To introduce the musical marvel of the age and to give you a chance to test our instruments and prove all our claims, we will send the Zobo Cornet, solid brass highly polished and lacquered, 12 inches long, 6 inch bell; with full instructions how to play and illustrated catalogue, prepaid for $1.00. We make this offer, believing that all interested will eventually organize a Zobo Band. This is a grand offer and you should not miss it. We warrant each instrument just as represented or money refunded. Send money by registered letter, postoffice money order, a bank draft payable to our order, or have your storekeeper order for you.

Two Wagons at One Price.

It is a matter of great convenience and a saving of labor for a farmer to have a low, handy wagon. They save more than half the labor of loading in hauling manure, hay, grain, corn, fodder, wood, stones, etc.

The man who already has a wagon may have one of these low, handy wagons at the small additional cost for a set of wheels. These Electric Steel Wheels, with either direct or stagger spokes, with broad faced tire, are made to fit any axle. You can convert your old wagon to a low, handy wagon in a few moments time. You thus virtually have two wagons at one price. .. Shepherding Our Island Lambs ..

Another Sunday School Opened for Porto Rico's Neglected Children by "The Christian Herald" and its Readers

WHEN that brave and distinguished Christian soldier, Gen. Guy V. Henry, with the last effort of his pen, made a touching plea in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in behalf of the "Little Lambs of Porto Rico," he must have foreseen the response that would come from sympathetic American hearts. For nearly three months past, the snows of winter have lain upon the grave of that soldier-statesman, who was beloved by the dusky people of the little West Indian island, but his appeal s already borne fruit. Educational plans are in progress in Porto Rico, and the ousands of hitherto neglected children are being reached by week-day and Sunday hools. In the spiritual work, the readers of this journal have -operated loyally with the good missionaries already the field, and they now have the satisfaction of tnessing the substantial growth of that part the work to which their efforts have been voted. From San Juan comes the cheer- g news of the opening of our new inday School in the Puerta Tierra ction of the city. A photograph the school building, with the holars and teachers grouped front, appears on this page. his photograph was taken Monday, January 29, by ecial arrangement. On e front of the building, the right, is a signboard

"The Christian Herald's" New Sunday School Recently Opened at Puerta Tierra, San Juan

earing the inscription in Spanish: "ESCUELA DOMINICAL DEL HERALDO CRISIANO. LOS DOMINGOS A LAS TRES DE LA TARDE," which being translated, reads: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD SUNDAY SCHOOL. OPEN AT THREE O'CLOCK IN THE AFTERNOON." On the porch of the neat-looking building are the teachers and their assistants. Mr. Jamieson, our Superintendent, stands beside Rev. Zerah C. Collins, in charge of the Y. M. C. A. work on the island. Concerning the district in which the new school is situated, and the work generally, Mr. Jamieson writes:

"The uplifting of this people is not a question of a few weeks or months. It is a question of years. Sunday School work and church extension are not a mushroom growth, but the fruit of years of intelligent, patient, prayerful labor. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School has been begun in Puerto Tierra and the good work will be systematically and earnestly carried on by myself, assisted by the Rev. Mr. Erwin, Mrs. Erwin and two other ladies, who are taking a deep interest in this most promising field of missionary effort. The rent of the building is twelve dollars a month in gold. About one hundred and twenty children can be accommodated. The location is central, thereby giving all an equal chance to attend. I am having some cards and bills printed for distribution among the people, notifying them when and where the school will be held. In addition to the Sunday work there will be a service every Wednesday evening for the special benefit of adults, which, of course, will naturally tend to keep up the interest in the Sunday School. We need seventy-five New Testaments in the Spanish and English language, and we also require the same number of hymn books in Spanish. I send you a photograph, which represents the model and training school which was opened recently with appropriate ceremonies in the [SEE PAGE 143]

These Questions Will be Answered Feb. 28

1. How do you account for the fact that the Christian era is dated some few years after the birth of Christ?
2. What is the meaning of the resurrection of the body? Is there any foundation in the Bible for the belief in the resurrection of the body in the sense that God will use the same elements which have constituted the mortal body in the formation of the incorruptible body?
3. Who is the author of the following lines and where may they be found:
"The voice of Jonathan was heard to express
Our president is going to war I guess."
4. The year 1896 was a leap year. Why is 1900 not a leap year?
5. In what sense was David "a man after God's own heart," in view of his heinous sin in the matter of Uriah and Bathsheba?
6. What is the meaning of the theological term "sanctification"?
7. Is or is not the world growing better?
8. Which is the more likely to foster crime—poverty or wealth?
9. How is the candle-power of gas light or electric light arrived at?
10. What is supposed to be the origin of the various names of the members of the human family?

Questions of the Week

1. What is the best definite plan for helping the poor?

The best method of helping the poor is to educate them to self-support. Industrial training can be made attractive; and its usefulness has been sufficiently demonstrated to call for its vigorous support. The poor should be taught, so far as possible, lessons of economy, sobriety and thrift. To know how to earn a living, and then how to spend a little less than one earns, is the best insurance against poverty. S. L. KNIGHT.

2. When was the name Cousin Jonathan first given to the United States as a nation?

Presumably in Lowell's Biglow Papers, where England and the United States are represented as cousins. The name "Brother Jonathan" originated in the times of the Revolutionary War, when Jonathan Trumbull, the elder, was governor of Connecticut. Washington placed great reliance upon his judgment and aid, saying, "We must consult 'Brother Jonathan.'" This passed into a by-word when difficulties arose, and so gradually became the national sobriquet.
G. E. KRAUTH.

3. Is civil government an institution of divine appointment?

Certainly. In Numbers 11: 16, 17, we read God's command to Moses to select seventy men of the elders of Israel, to whom God promised to give of the spirit that was upon Moses, and who then should bear the burden with him. In Deut. 16: 18, we read: "Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates . . . and they shall judge the people with just judgment." Christ bid his questioners render to Cæsar the things that were Cæsar's. Paul speaks very definitely on the subject in Rom. 13: 1-7. "The powers that be are ordained of God," he says; and again: "He [the ruler] is the minister of God to thee for good."
E. O. LEE.

4. In the Bible we read, "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." Through what instrumentality does God execute his vengeance on evil-doers?

First, through the agency of natural forces. If one violates God's natural law, nothing short of a miracle can relieve him from the natural consequences of his act. Second, through the agency of civil power. When the subject-matter of the offence is covered by human law, civil governments become the agents of God to deal with the offender. Third, by direct visitation. From the date of the flood, down to the present age, both sacred and profane history are replete with evidences that the hand of God falls heavily on those who persist in an attitude of utter defiance to his moral and divine principles which fall not within the reach of natural or civil redress. Fourth, by future punishment, on which we scarcely dare even to speculate. But we know that it is a "fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God."
J. O. BLACKBURN.

5. What is the leading lesson to be learned from the life of the late Dwight L. Moody?

The potency for good of a life consecrated absolutely to God and thoroughly controlled by the Holy Spirit. In the presence of such consecration and control the lack of classical education does not appear to have hindered Mr. Moody's success for a moment.
L. C. TALBOT.

6. Is it ever justifiable to use strategy or a ruse to gain a good end in church work?

If strategy means deceit, no. But there is a holy strategy that may well be used in seeking the highest welfare of one's fellow men. If not, what did Christ mean when he said: "wise as serpents, harmless as doves"; or Paul, when he wrote to the Corinthians: "being crafty, I caught you with guile." Paul speaks of being all things to all men, and he says that to the Jews he became as a Jew that he might gain the Jews, etc. (I. Cor. 9: 20). Christ made as though he was going farther at Emmaus, and had appeared to the two disciples on the way thither as a stranger. Was not this strategy on his part? Nathan used strategy to bring David's sin home to him. It was by strategy that Israel took Ai, and by the strategy of the pitchers, lamps and trumpets that Gideon and his little army routed the Midianites. M. E. FREEMAN.

7. What is the relative strength of the armies and navies of the five leading nations of the earth?

In December, 1899, Captain W. R. Hamilton announced publicly, that the United States official reports, on file at the War Department, at Washington, embrace the following exhibit: Germany, war footing, army: officers, 66,558; non-commissioned officers and men, 5,738,793. Russia, war footing, army: officers, 65,990; non-commissioned officers and men, 5,143,574; France, war footing, army officers, 60,958; non-commissioned officers and men, 4,933,190. Great Britain, war footing: army officers, 7,826; non-commissioned officers and men, 686,795. United States, regular permanent army limited by law to 25,000 men. Italy, war footing, army officers, 55,442; non-commissioned officers and men, 1,667,456.

The naval strength of these countries is as follows: Great Britain—vessels of all grades, 1,055; officers, 3,219; sailors and marines, 121,115. France—vessels of all grades, 690; officers, 2,015; sailors and marines, 96,960. Germany—vessels of all grades, 320; officers, 1,555; sailors and marines, 24,500. Russia—vessels of all grades, 500; officers, 2,258; sailors and marines, 48,311. United States—vessels of all grades, 283; commissioned officers, 1,340; marine officers, 201; enlisted sailors, 14,603; marines, 6,000. Italy—vessels of all grades, 341; officers, 840; sailors and marines, 24,440. A large proportion of the European vessels enumerated are small boats and old hulks, of which the United States has but a small percentage.
S. V. LEECH.

8. When we read, in the Revelation, of books being kept in heaven and also in connection with the Judgment Day, are we to understand the language as literal or figurative?

Literal if considered in its expression of a result, and figurative if we consider it to mean books like the books of earth. Inasmuch as the human mind cannot fully understand the divine mind, we cannot know exactly what is meant by books in heaven. But a perfect record of the life of each individual is certainly indicated. LOUISE C. TOWER.

9. A gentleman is assured by physicians that he cannot live many months, owing to the presence of a disease from which he now suffers little, if at all. He has means more than ample to provide himself with necessaries and comforts. What should he do with the remaining months of his life?

Speaking generally, a man who knows he must die in a few months should do with his life just what he would do with it if he hoped to prolong it many years. But if there has been neglect of spiritual concerns, and all that that implies, the invalid should first commit his soul to the Redeemer and then in every way possible seek to make amends for his non-performance of duties to his kinsfolk and his fellow mortals. Every man owes to his fellow men the active example of a Christian life. Where this has not been given it will be difficult to crowd into a few months the contribution of Christian love and duty that should have marked the many years of the past. R. T. CARLTON.

10. When did celibacy among Christian priests come into vogue?

In the fourth century synods began to interdict priests from marrying. But it was not until 1048 that the Pope (Leo IX.) interdicted all married priests from exercising any spiritual function. This law stood until 1074, when Gregory VII. decreed excommunication against all who should attend mass celebrated by a married priest, and deposition against the priest himself. The Council of Trent, 1593, discussed the subject and positively enjoined priestly celibacy.
FREDERICK H. BATES.

Miscellaneous Questions

Bertha S., Greenpoint, N. Y. The circulation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD during 1899 was 13,962,000 copies, or an average of 268,500 copies every week of the year.

Ethan Allan L., Binghamton, N. Y. Why are the Jews called Hebrews?

It is held by the best authorities and by the Jews themselves that the name is derived from Heber, or Eber (which means "from the other side," or a sojourner, or immigrant). Heber was the son of Salah and the father of Peleg (see Gen. 10: 24; 11: 14, and I. Chron. 1: 25). Abram was the first to be called a Hebrew (Gen. 14: 13), presumably in the immigrant sense. The name is seldom used of the Israelites in the Old Testament, except when the speaker is a foreigner, or when the Israelites speak of themselves to one of another nation. Some writers have held that Hebrew is derived from Abraham (Abrai), but this explanation is not generally adopted.

Reader, Joy, N. Y. Can a man be a good Christian and play cards? I do not mean to play for drink or gamble, but to play respectably as in a game of letters, authors, dominoes, etc.?

The true Christian will do nothing whereby he may place a stumbling-block in the way of another. While the mere act of card-playing may in itself be innocent enough, it is a practice which has proved the first step to ruin to countless multitudes. On the other hand, man's moral, spiritual or mental character has never been improved in the slightest degree by card-playing. It is not an accomplishment that wins for a man esteem and confidence either in business or in private life, but the reverse. For the professed follower of Christ to attempt to justify this dangerous and evil pastime is an incomprehensible inconsistency. See Rom. 14: 15-21. Apply the fixed principle that "it is good not to do anything whereby thy brother stumbleth," and you will never touch another card, lest by example you may lead weaker ones into sin and possibly be the means of their spiritual destruction.

Evidently, judging from the following letter, there has been a great demand for Bibles for the blind, as a result of the kind offer of the New York Bible Society:

NEW YORK, Feb. 5.

Dear Mr. Klopsch:—You published for us in your paper of Jan. 31, our offer to give a volume of the Scriptures in raised letters to any blind person needing it, free of charge. Will you kindly withdraw this offer as the applications have been so numerous that this special stock of Bibles is entirely exhausted? WM. E. GEER, Agent N. Y. Bible Society.

H. B. L., Ray Brook, N. Y. How may a person know that he is converted? Is believing all that is necessary?

A mere intellectual belief is not sufficient. As James remarks, "The devils believe." Belief in the sense of trusting, confiding, is required. It is the kind of belief that a patient has in his physician when, in a critical illness, he trusts his life to a physician and calls in no other. Or as when a man charged with murder puts all his reliance on his lawyer and believes in his power to secure his acquittal. Or it is the belief of an outlaw who trusts to a ruler who has issued a proclamation of amnesty. The man who puts himself in Christ's hands for salvation will try to resist all evil and will obey Christ's commands and will seek from Christ the help he stands ready to give to enable him to lead a holy life.

Here is a suggestion which some of our Protestant pastors in Buffalo may be able to put into practice:

Why not have a building on the Pan-American grounds at Buffalo, where all denominations could worship—a Union Hall, and also an amphitheater where the life of our Saviour could be illustrated?

Troubled Reader, Philadelphia, Pa. In what way does religion give one power to overcome a besetting sin? If a man falls under the power of the sin after accepting the aid religion gives him, must he conclude that God has not granted the aid as promised?

There is first the direct power which God promises to give through Christ to those who sincerely and earnestly seek it. Then, there is the subjective power that comes from a soul turning decisively to God. This Chalmers called "The expulsive power of a new affection." It is an over-mastering impulse which leaves no room in the mind for the old enemy. When a man falls again under the power of the sin, he need not conclude that God has not given him the aid. He has more reason to think that the aid was given, but not used. Man must work with God in such a case and must not expect to be delivered without striving, but to be delivered through striving in the new strength that God gives him.

Alice M. Richard, Brooklyn, N. Y., sends us six verses of inspiring poetry on THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which say many good and kind things. We give one of the verses:

The friends who help the young and old
Their Sabbath lessons through—Cannot begin to realize
How little we could do
If they should ever give us up
To study all alone—
Without their helpful hints and points,
Their kind and cheering tone.

Girard, Ill. If A. M. stands for before noon, P. M. for noon, and P. M. for after noon, what is midnight—A. M. or P. M., or neither?

It is midnight, but there is no particular sign for it. It might well be quoted as md't, as in railroad time tables. It cannot correctly be quoted as A. M. or P. M., because in one sense it is neither, in another sense both.

East Puestenkill, N. Y. Do you believe that the spirits of our departed friends are with us and know our sorrows and joys as they did when in life? I mean those that have died in the Lord.

There is no passage of Scripture that can be quoted as supporting this view. God's angels are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who shall be heirs of salvation, and God's Holy Spirit dwells with all true believers. What more can be needed in the way of spiritual accompaniment?

Subscriber, Syracuse, N. Y. Is it right for me to address my prayers to Christ or to the Holy Spirit? In praying, for instance, for recovery from sickness, should the prayer be made to God the Father, to Christ or to the Holy Spirit?

Our conception of the Trinity is not of separate personalities but of a divine Unity. It is a threefold manifestation of one Supreme Being. Christ was a manifestation in human form; the Holy Spirit a manifestation in divine influence. A metaphysical explanation of the triune existence could not be given in the space at our disposal and could never be made quite clear to the finite mind. No man could fully comprehend the being of God and he should not expect to do so. Prayer is usually made to God, in Christ's name and we may ask him for the gift of the Holy Spirit, for healing or for any other blessing. If you will read John 14 and indeed the whole Gospel, you will see, however, that the union of the divine Three is so complete that prayer made to Christ or to the Holy Spirit is the same in spirit as if addressed to God the Father and is the same in its effect.

presence of 350 children. The building is beautifully situated on the military road in the Puerto Tierra section of San Juan under the shadow of the fortress of Cristobal Colon. This, I believe, is the first building erected in Porto Rico by Americans in which strictly American school methods are being carried out in the instruction of children. It is admirably adapted for the purposes for which it has been built. There are twelve rooms in all, two of which are reserved for the Board of Education, which will occupy them as soon as furnished. In the construction of the building the health and comfort of the pupils have been most carefully considered. The different class-rooms are fully supplied with all the appliances necessary for the work to be done. The school is divided into nine departments, viz.: kindergarten, primary, intermediate, grammar, high school in English and Spanish, scientific, training, and industrial. The school is under the supervision of Dr. Hill, assisted by a corps of scholarly, experienced educators, who have done and are now doing a grand work in raising the present generation of Porto Ricans to a higher moral and religious plane. Assuredly the inauguration of the high school of San Juan is an earnest of good things to come. It reflects the highest credit upon the intelligence and patriotism of the citizens of the capital."

SAN JUAN'S NEW TRAINING SCHOOL

"Rev. Zerah C. Collins, head of the Y. M. C. A. work at San Juan, writes: "The late official census which has just been completed, but not published, gives to Porto Rico a population of 957,000 souls. With an area of 3,550 square miles, the island has a population of 269 human beings to the square mile. This, however, is in a way misleading, as large tracts in the interior are but sparsely settled, giving the cities and suburbs and the villages a congested population. The centuries of Spanish misrule, with its attendant poverty, together with the home-life consequent upon this crowded condition of the people, can have had but one result—the lowering of the standard of morality, education and religion. A Christian nation is now as far as possible endeavoring to counteract the evil effect of these years of oppression. Unjust marriage laws, the curse of which will require generations to wipe out, have been amended, public schools are being introduced as rapidly as possible, private schools encouraged, and Christian workers of all denominations helped.

"The educational feature is a vital one, going hand in hand with the Gospel. The late census gives 280,000 school children and thus far provisions are made for but 30,000 by the government. The difficulties to overcome and problems to be solved in inaugurating the public school system in Porto Rico are great and numerous and it must of necessity take time for the officials in charge of the educational work to teach these thousands of children. From observation we should say that the young men and women who come here to teach should have a missionary spirit, realizing that in their field of labor they are exerting a mighty force for the uplifting of an unfortunate and downtrodden people. Not only should these 280,000 children be given a secular education, but as disciples of him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me," the Christians of the United States should see that they are given a right conception of the Gospel and the Word of God. This cannot be taught them in their homes, for in the true sense few of them have homes. It cannot be taught in the public schools as this would not be in harmony with our public school system. The most practical way to them then is through the Sunday School and under conditions very similar to those which brought the Sunday School as an institution into existence. A good work is already being accomplished through this instrumentality, some 800 scholars being reached by the several schools on the island. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which raised $18,000 for the starving hurricane sufferers, has been one of the pioneers in this noble work and we are glad to be able to present to its readers a view of the latest school established under its auspices in Puerto Tierra, a thickly settled suburb of San Juan. Rev. James Jamieson, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Sunday School worker, has long had this point in view, and on Sunday, January 28, with the cooperation of a number of Spanish-speaking missionaries, the school was opened with more than one hundred scholars."

A Living Testimony

At a recent meeting of the Student Volunteer Missionary Society, Archdeacon Moule related an incident of his work in China. He said: "I remember one day toward sunset speaking in a town where the people showed some hostility. As a rule the people of mid-China are courteous, but these people were exceedingly rude and menacing. With my helper, an intelligent and earnest native Christian, I went to the top of a hill to spend a half hour in prayer. On our way the aged Chinaman said: 'You have been discouraged to-day.' I admitted that I had been depressed by the treatment we had received. 'Well, sir,' he said, 'there is no need. Do you know I was born in this very village and it was here that I first heard the Gospel. Fifteen years ago the foreign preachers came and I went to hear them. They were received as we were to-day, with ridicule and derision. I am sorry to say that I took part in opposing them. In a few weeks they came again. I was there and listened to them. One of them spoke good Chinese talk and I liked what he said. I thought much about it after they were gone. At their next visit I asked some questions and I learned more. God blessed their words and opened my heart."

The Artist Preacher

How Rev. W. E. Needham Presents the Gospel in Pictures While Preaching

MEETINGS now being held in Rutherford, N. J., prove how a great talent may be turned to account in Gospel work. The preacher has a pad of manila paper three feet square on an easel on the platform. By his side is a sheaf of colored crayons. As he begins his sermon his hand is deftly sketching on the pad. His subject is the rescue of our lost race by Christ. As he talks the pad shows a seething sea, the waves rising high and tossing angrily. In the distance is a ship in distress. The eye watching the artist's rapid fingers, sees that the ship is about to founder. "What is to be done? Must the crew and passengers perish?" The preacher stops his work and asks the questions. What is he doing now? Across the stormy billows a life-boat is seen approaching the ship. Who will enter? Those who stay on the ship must go down with her; only those who leap into the lifeboat will be saved. Who will trust their salvation to Christ who came to the rescue of the world? As the preacher pleads with sinners his vivid delineation of the storm is before his audience telling its story.

REV. W. E. NEEDHAM ILLUSTRATING HIS SERMON

At another time his subject is the downward course of the sinner. The crayons show on the sheet a bright boy leaving the farm. Father and mother are saying good-by and asking God's blessing on the boy. The next scene is in the city, where the boy is being introduced to the haunts of dissipation. He is drinking and while he draws the scene the preacher describes the temptations of city life.

With word and with crayon he follows the sad journey downward until he draws a miserable man, ragged and dirty, begging in the street. "What shall be the end? Will he die like that?" A deathbed appears on the pad and the audience shudders at its misery. "Or will he accept the deliverance Christ offers to the captive and turn to God?" The crayon is at work depicting the contrast. At one of the Rutherford meetings last week a miserable drunkard saw his own life thus portrayed and came after the meeting begging to be led to Christ.

In another town last summer a lady sat watching and listening to the artist-preacher. On the pad was a long toilsome road. In the distance was a walled city. A few strokes showed a criminal fleeing from justice. Far behind him was the avenger pursuing him. By the roadside were booths and stalls and places of entertainment. Would the criminal be beguiled into loitering and resting, or would he run on, intent on reaching the City of Refuge before the avenger caught him? "What would you do?" the preacher asked. "Will the theatre or the ball-room detain you, or will you fly to the only refuge of safety." The lady knew the case was her own and then and there made her resolve. She is now one of the most earnest workers for Christ in her town.

Rev. W. E. Needham, the artist-preacher, who is doing this effective work, is the youngest of the four Needham brothers, who are all ministers of the Gospel. He was born in the south of Ireland, and from early boyhood showed a wonderful skill in drawing. It was developed during his school days, and later, when his elder brother, George, had settled in this country, the youth came here on George's invitation. He studied in the Lowell Institute in Boston and in a school of design in Philadelphia. Moody and Sankey held services in the latter city while he was there, and young Needham was led to give his heart to Christ.

He then returned to Europe to obtain a theological education and came back here afterwards to work in Christ's vineyard. He has labored as pastor at West Chester, Pa., at Germantown, Pa., and in Brooklyn, N. Y. In one of his sermons he took up a sheet of paper and drew a sketch, and he noticed how it arrested the attention of many in his audience.

From thence forward his sermons have been thus illustrated. He can put a vivid sketch on the pad in three minutes, and often a whole series are presented in the course of one service. So many applications have reached Mr. Needham for help in Y. M. C. A. meetings, Sunday Schools and evangelistic services, that he has decided to devote his whole time to this work, and has resigned his Brooklyn pastorate that he may be free to engage in it. It is a remarkable example of consecrated talent and it is enjoying the blessing of God.

A Christian's Vision of Heaven

Fanny Bryant Stebbins, who died in Rochester on the 1st inst., was reared in a Christian family and was a Christian in heart and purpose, but timid, diffident and sensitive. Accounts of human need and suffering distressed her and she wondered why such things were, while God was proclaimed to be kind and good to the children of men, but in her last illness—during which she was thus much troubled—as death approached, her mind was clear. She said, "Don't be afraid," and just at the last, with a smile, she exclaimed, "I see heaven now!" and was at rest. Doubts and troubles often come that cloud the sky, but the heart, yearning for God and the truth, is assured at last of perfect rest.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT.

A Healthy Religion

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Psalm 91: 16, ... } With long life will I satisfy him

THROUGH the mistake of its friends religion has been chiefly associated with sick beds and graveyards. The whole subject to many people is odorous with chlorine and carbolic acid. There are people who cannot pronounce the word religion without hearing in it the clipping chisel of the tombstone cutter. It is high time that this thing were changed, and that religion instead of being represented as a hearse to carry out the dead, should be represented as a chariot in which the living are to triumph.

Religion, so far from subtracting from one's vitality, is a glorious addition. It is sanative, curative, hygienic. It is good for the eyes, good for the ears, good for the spleen, good for the digestion, good for the nerves, good for the muscles. When David, in another part of the Psalms, prays that religion may be dominant, he does not speak of it as a mild sickness, or an emaciation, or an attack of moral and spiritual cramp: he speaks of it as "the saving health of all nations;" while God, in the text promises longevity to the pious, saying: "With long life will I satisfy him."

The fact is that men and women die too soon. It is high time that religion joined the hand of medical science in attempting to improve human longevity. Adam lived nine hundred and thirty years. Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years. As late in the history of the world as Vespasian, there were at one time in his empire forty-five people one hundred and thirty-five years old. So far down as the sixteenth century Peter Zartan died at one hundred and eighty-five years of age. I do not say that religion will ever take the race back to antediluvian longevity, but I do say that the length of human life will be greatly improved.

It is said in Isaiah 65: 20: "The child shall die a hundred years old." Now, if according to Scripture the child is to be a hundred years old, may not the men and women reach to three hundred and four hundred and five hundred? The fact is that we are mere dwarfs and skeletons compared with some of the generations that are to come. Take the African race. They have been under bondage for centuries. Give them a chance and they develop a Toussaint L'Ouverture. And if the white race shall be brought out from under the serfdom of sin, what shall be the body? what shall be the soul? Religion has only just touched our world. Give it full power for a few centuries and who can tell what will be the strength of man and the beauty of woman, and the longevity of all?

My design is to show that practical religion is the friend of longevity; I prove it, first, from the fact that it makes the care of our health a positive Christian duty. Whether we shall keep early or late hours, whether we shall take food digestible or indigestible, whether there shall be thorough or incomplete mastication, are questions very often referred to the realm of whimsicality; but the Christian man lifts this whole problem of health into the accountable and the divine. He says: "God has given me this body, and he has called it the temple of the Holy Ghost, and to deface its altars or mar its walls or crumble its pillars is a God-defying sacrilege." He sees God's caligraphy in every page—anatomical and physiological. He says: "God has given me a wonderful body for noble purposes." That arm with thirty-two curious bones wielded by forty-six curious muscles, and all under the brain's telegraphy—three hundred and fifty pounds of blood rushing through the heart every hour—the heart in twenty-four hours beating 100,000 times, during the same time the lungs taking in fifty-seven hogsheads of air, and all this mechanism not more mighty than delicate and easily disturbed and demolished.

The Christian man says to himself: "If I hurt my nerves, if I hurt my brain, if I hurt any of my physical faculties I insult God and call for dire retribution." Why did God tell the Levites not to offer to him in sacrifice animals imperfect and diseased? He meant to tell us in all the ages that we are to offer to God our very best physical condition, and a man who through irregular or gluttonous eating ruins his health, is not offering to God such a sacrifice. Why did Paul write for his cloak at Troas? Why should such a great man as Paul be anxious about a thing so insignificant as an overcoat? It was because he knew that with pneumonia and rheumatism he would not be worth half as much to God and the church as with respiration easy and foot free.

An intelligent Christian man would consider it an absurdity to kneel down at night and pray and ask God's protection while at the same time he kept the windows of his bedroom tight shut against fresh air. He would just as soon think of going to the top of his house and leaping off and then praying to God to keep him from getting hurt. Just as long as you refer this whole subject of physical health to the realm of whimsicality, or to the pastry-cook, or to the butcher, or to the baker, or to the apothecary, or to the clothier, you are not acting like a Christian. Take care of all your physical forces—nervous, muscular, bone, brain, cellular tissue—for all you must be brought to judgment.

Smoking your nervous system into fidgets, burning out the coating of your stomach with wine logwooded and strychnined, walking with thin shoes to make your feet look delicate, pinched at the waist until you are nigh cut in two, and neither part worth anything, groaning about sick headache and palpitation of the heart, which you think came from God, when they came from your own folly.

What right has any man or woman to deface the temple of the Holy Ghost? What is the ear? Why, it is the whispering gallery of the human soul. What is the eye? It is the observatory God constructed, its telescope sweeping the heavens. So wonderful are these bodies that God names his own attributes after different parts of them. His omniscience—it is God's eye. His omnipresence—it is God's ear. His omnipotence—it is God's arm. The upholstery of the midnight heavens—it is the work of God's fingers. His life-giving power—it is the breath of the Almighty. His dominion—"the government shall be upon his shoulder." A body so divinely honored and so divinely constructed, let us be careful not to abuse it.

When it becomes a Christian duty to take care of our health, is not the whole tendency toward longevity? If I toss my watch about recklessly and drop it on the pavement and wind it up any time of day or night I happen to think of it, and often let it run down, while you are careful with your watch and never abuse it and wind it up just at the same hour every night and put it in a place where it will not suffer from the violent changes of atmosphere, which watch will last the longer? Common sense answers. Now, the human body is God's watch. You see the hands of the watch. You see the face of the watch; but the beating of the heart is the ticking of the watch. Oh, be careful and do not let it run down!

Again, I remark that practical religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it is a protest against dissipations which injure and destroy the health. Bad men and women live a very short life. Their sins kill them. I know hundreds of good old men, but I do not know half a dozen bad old men. Why? They do not get old. Lord Byron died at Missolonghi at thirty-six years of age, himself his own Mazeppa, his unbridled passions the horse that dashed with him into the desert. Edgar A. Poe died at Baltimore at thirty-eight pears of age. The black raven that alighted on the bust above his chamber door was delirium tremens:

Only this and nothing more.

Napoleon Bonaparte lived only just beyond midlife, then died at St. Helena, and one of his doctors said that his disease was induced by excessive snuffing. The hero of Austerlitz, the man who by one step of his foot in the centre of Europe shook the earth, killed by a snuff-box! Oh, how many people we have known who have not lived out half their days because of their dissipations and indulgences. Now practical religion is a protest against all dissipation of any kind.

"But," you say, "professors of religion have fallen, professors of religion have got drunk, professors of religion have misappropriated trust funds, professors of religion have absconded." Yes; but they threw away their religion before they did their morality. If a man on a White Star line steamer bound for Liverpool, in mid-Atlantic jumps overboard and is drowned, is that anything against the White Star line's capacity to take the man across the ocean? And if a man jumps over the gunwale of his religion and goes down never to rise, is that any reason for your believing that religion has no capacity to take the man clear through? In the one case if he had kept to the steamer his body would have been saved; in the other case if he had kept to his religion his morals would have been saved.

There are aged people who would have been dead twenty-five years ago but for the defences and the equipoise of religion. You have no more natural resistance than hundreds of people who lie in the cemeteries to-day, slain by their own vices. The doctors made their case as kind and pleasant as they could, and it was called congestion of the brain or something else, but the snakes and the blue flies that seemed to crawl over the pillow in the sight of the delirious patient showed what was the matter with him. You, the aged Christian man, walked along by that unhappy one until you came to the golden pillar of the Christian life. You went to the right; he went to the left. That is all the difference between you. Oh, if this religion is a protest against all forms of dissipation, then it is an illustrious friend of longevity. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Again, religion is a friend of longevity in the fact that it takes the worry out of our temporalities. It is not work that kills men, it is worry. When a man becomes a genuine Christian he makes over to God not only his affections but his family, his business, his reputation, his body, his mind, his soul—everything. Industrious he will be, but never worrying, because God is managing his affairs. How can he worry about business when in answer to his prayers God tells him when to buy and when to sell; and if he gain that is best, and if he lose that is best?

Suppose you had a supernatural neighbor who came in and said: "Sir, I want you to call on me in every exigency; I am your fast friend; I could fall back on $20,000,000; I can foresee a panic ten years; I hold the controlling stock in thirty of the best monetary institutions of this country; whenever you are in any trouble call on me and I will help you; you can have my money and you can have my influence; here is my hand in pledge of it." How much would you worry about business? Why, you would say: "I'll do the best I can, and then I'll depend on my friend's generosity for the rest."

Now more than that is promised to every Christian business man. God says to him: "I own New York and London and St. Petersburg and Pekin, and Australia and California are mine; I can foresee a panic a thousand years; I have all the resources of the universe, and I am your fast friend; when you get in business trouble or any other trouble, call on me and I will help; here is my hand in pledge of omnipotent deliverance." How much should that man worry? Not muc What lion will dare to put his paw that Daniel? Is there not rest in thi Is there not an eternal vacation in this

"Oh," you say, "here is a man w asked God for a blessing in a certain e terprise, and he lost five thousand dolla in it. Explain that." I will. Yonder a factory, and one wheel is going nor and the other wheel is going south, a one wheel plays laterally and the oth plays vertically. I go to the manufactur and I say: "O manufacturer, your m chinery is a contradiction. Why do y not make all the wheels go one way "Well," he says, "I made them to go opposite directions on purpose, and th produce the right result. You go dow stairs and examine the carpets we a turning out in this establishment and y will see." I go down on the other flo and I see the carpets, and I am oblig to confess that though the wheels in th factory go in opposite directions, th turn out a beautiful result; and while am standing there looking at the exquisi fabric an old Scripture passage com into my mind: "All things work togeth for good to them who love God." Is the not rest in that? Is there not tonic that? Is there not longevity in that?

Suppose a man is all the time worrie about his reputation? One man says l lies, another says he is stupid, anoth says he is dishonest, and half a doze printing establishments attack him a he is in a great state of excitement a worry and fume, and cannot sleep; b religion comes to him and says: "Ma God is on your side; he will take care your reputation; if God be for you w can be against you?" How much shou that man worry about his reputatio Not much. If that broker who, son years ago in Wall Street, after he had lo money, sat down and wrote a farew letter to his wife before he blew his brai out—if instead of taking out of his pock a pistol he had taken out a well-read Ne Testament there would have been one le suicide. O nervous and feverish peop of the world, try this almighty sedativ you will live twenty-five years long under its soothing power. It is not chlor that you want, or morphine that you wan it is the Gospel of Jesus Christ. "Wit long life will I satisfy him."

Again, practical religion is a friend longevity in the fact that it removes a corroding care about a future existenc Every man wants to know what is to b come of him. If you get on board a ra train you want to know at what dep it is going to stop; if you get on board ship you want to know into what harb it is going to run, and if you should te me you have no interest in what is to b your future destiny, I would in as poli a way as I know how, tell you I did n believe you. Before I had this matt settled with reference to my future exi tence, the question almost worried me i to ruined health. The anxieties me have upon this subject put together woul make a martyrdom. This is a state awful unhealthiness. There are peop who fret themselves to death for fear dying.

I want to take the strain off your nerve and the depression off your soul, and make two or three experiments. Exper ment the first: When you go out of th world it does not make any differenc whether you have been good or bad or whether you believed truth error, you will go straight to glory. "Im possible," you say. "My common sens as well as my religion teaches that th bad and the good cannot live together fo ever. You give me no comfort in that e periment." Experiment the second When you leave this world you will g into an intermediate state where you ca get converted and prepared for heaven "Impossible," you say; "as the tree fal eth so it must lie, and I cannot postpon to an intermediate state that reformatio which ought to have been effected in thi state." Experiment the third: There i no future world; when a man dies that i the last of him. Do not worry about wha you are to do in another state of being you will not do anything. "Impossible," you say; "there is something that tell me that death is not the appendix but th preface; there is something that teils m that on this side of the grave I only ge started and that I shall go on forever; m power to think says 'forever,' my ca pacity to enjoy or suffer 'forever.'"

Well, you defeat me in my three experiments. I have only one more to make, and if you defeat me in that I am exhausted. A mighty One on a knoll back of Jerusalem one day, the skies filled with forked lightnings and the earth filled with volcanic disturbances, turned his pale and agonized face toward the heavens and said: "I take the sins and sorrows of the ages into my own heart. I am the expiation. Witness earth and heaven and hell, I am the expiation." And the hammer struck him, and the spears punctured him, and heaven thundered: "The wages of sin is death!" "The soul that sinneth it shall die!" "I will by no means clear the guilty!" Then there was silence for half an hour, and the lightnings were drawn back into the scabbard of the sky, and the earth ceased to quiver, and all the colors of the sky began to shift themselves into a rainbow woven out of the falling tears of Jesus, and there was red as of the bloodshedding, and there was blue as of the bruising, and there was green as of the heavenly foliage, and there was orange as of the day-dawn. And along the line of the blue I saw the words: "I was bruised for their iniquities." And along the line of the red I saw the words: "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin." And along the line of the green I saw the words: "The leaves of the tree of life for the healing of the nations." And along the line of the orange I saw the words: "The day-spring from on high hath visited us."

And then I saw the storm was over, and the rainbow rose higher and higher until it seemed retreating to another heaven, and planting one column of its colors on one side the eternal hill, and planting the other column of its colors on the other side the eternal hill, it rose upward and upward, and behold there was a rainbow about the throne.

Accept that sacrifice and quit worrying. Take the tonic, the inspiration, the longevity of this truth. Religion is sunshine, that is health. Religion is fresh air and pure water, they are healthy. Religion is warmth, that is healthy. The doctors will tell you that a quiet conscience and pleasant anticipations are hygienic. I offer you perfect peace now and hereafter.

What do you want in the future world? Tell me and you shall have it. Orchards? There are the trees with twelve manner of fruits, yielding fruit every month. Water scenery? There is the river of life, from under the throne of God, clear as crystal, and the sea of glass mingled with fire. Do you want music? There is the oratorio of the Creation led on by Adam, and the oratorio of the Red Sea led on by Moses, and the oratorio of the Messiah led on by St. Paul, while the archangel, with swinging baton, controls the one hundred and forty-four thousand who make up the orchestra.

Do you want reunion? There are your dead children waiting to kiss you, waiting to embrace you, waiting to twist garlands in your hair. You have been accustomed to open the door on this side the sepulchre. I open the door on the other side the sepulchre. You have been accustomed to walk in the wet grass on the top of the grave. I show you the under side of the grave; the bottom has fallen out and the long ropes with which the pallbearers let down your dead, let them clear through into heaven. Glory be to God for this robust, healthy religion! It will have a tendency to make you live long in this world, and in the world to come you will have eternal life. "With long life will I satisfy him."

Mr. Moody's Final Work

Mr. Theo. Henshall, of Kansas City, writes this interesting letter concerning Mr. Moody's last evangelistic tour:

I had the honor of hearing D. L. Moody every time he preached in Kansas City. He preached ten sermons and gave two talks at after-meetings. I heard nearly every word he uttered. Of course, sometimes his voice was lowered. He was Elijah (and looked it), teaching the school of the prophets. About one hundred ministers of the Gospel sat at his feet, that is, a platform a little lower than his stand was kept exclusively for clergymen. Convention Hall seats about 15,000 people, and when Mr. Moody was taken sick folks were turned away. It was the great experience of my life.

Moody's Greatest Victory

How he Mastered a Crowd of Oxford Students who had Determined to Break up his Services—A Famous English Revival Recalled

DWIGHT L. MOODY'S "Greatest Life Victory"—so he called it, in conversation with his friend, Dr. Pierson, who has followed his course with a deep personal interest ever since he was first felt as a power in evangelism. He, at Dr. Pierson's request, recounted in detail the experience given below, substantially as here narrated; only that the Mothers' Prayer Meeting which turned the tide, is not here referred to. Those who loved Mr. Moody will find this relic of history of deep interest. It also illustrates the fact that "one with God is a majority." A. T. PIERSON.

Speaking to 'Varsity Men

Mr. Moody's mission in Oxford began on the evening of Monday, November 13, 1882, by a general meeting in the Corn Exchange. Mr. Moody preached in the Exchange, and Mr. E. W. Bliss in the Town Hall, while Mr. Sankey found scope for the exercise of his special gift in both. The work among the university students constituted one of the most remarkable chapters in the whole history of the revival. Meetings specially designed for the 'Varsity men took place each evening at the close of the service for the general public. One Monday evening, the "undergrads" were invited to meet in the assembly rooms of the Clarendon Hotel. A considerable number responded, and it soon became evident that youthful effervescence and boisterous behavior were to manifest themselves. There was a large attendance of local clergy, and Mr. Sankey sang several of his hymns. Mr. Moody selected a chapter from the Book of Ezekiel, and began reading it. Some of the audience commenced stamping and shouting "hear, hear," in a very impious manner. Mr. Moody immediately closed his Bible, and in scathing tones of rebuke said he would rather play with forked lightning, or meddle with the most deadly diseases, than trifle with the Word of God. He then asked those gentlemen who wished him to continue to rise, and the whole assembly, with the exception of a few, instantly did so. The result was striking and effective, there being no more interruptions during the evening.

Riotous Undergraduates

On Tuesday evening, the assembly room was again crowded. At the Clarendon on Wednesday evening, many undergraduates appeared to have come with the express purpose of making fun of the proceedings. Mr. Moody had not proceeded far before it was evident from criticisms indulged in an undertone, that there were many present who were not inclined to give the speaker a fair hearing. Soon there was open laughter. Mr. Moody said it was very easy to laugh at these things, but they were fixed and eternal. They would live long enough to see what he said was true, and that a man had to reap what he sowed. Let them sow good seed, and not tares, and by-and-by they would have an abundant harvest.

Ample Apologies

On the third evening there came the turn of the tide. Having set in motion the machinery of the after-meeting, Mr. Moody found himself in the midst of a group of young students, most of whom had been among the disturbers. With intrepidity and readiness of resource he seized the opportunity, and proceeded in the plainest, though most courteous terms, to tell these young friends what he thought of them and their reprehensible conduct. They assented to all he said, and readily tendered a verbal apology. Mr. Moody accepted this amende honorable so far as he was concerned, but said he considered they ought to make further reparation by taking prominent seats at the meeting the following evening.

The results fully justified his line of action. On Thursday evening, some of the worst of the malcontents sat on the front seats, and were patterns of attention and good behavior. Mr. Moody addressed his young brethren with wonderful power on the barriers that oppose themselves to a frank acceptance of the Christian life. The Friday evening meeting the Town Hall, which has a seating capacity of nine hundred, was crowded.

MR. MOODY APPEALS TO THE OXFORD STUDENTS TO CONFESS CHRIST

Young Hearts Won

Here and there a young gownsman in the outskirts of the audience might be seen lounging on a bench with an expression of indolent nonchalance on his countenance, showing that he "cared for none of these things." Now and again the inherent hilariousness of these young bloods would bubble over at some of Mr. Moody's pungent and quaint observations.

Mr. Moody's sermon was one of most remarkable power. His subject was the value of moral courage in a bold confession of Christ before men, and many instances from the Scripture record were adduced to illustrate this. Having dismissed the first meeting, and gathered the large number that remained into a compact body near the platform, Mr. Moody adopted a more colloquial form of address, and resumed his talk on "Confessing Christ." "It will be a cross to you to confess Christ to-night," he said, "but the best thing to do is to take it up. If you ever see the kingdom of God, you will have to take up the cross: it will never be easier to take up than now. 'Whosoever shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of Man confess before the angels of heaven.' Think of Jesus Christ confessing you, and saying, 'This is my disciple.' Is there not some one here who is willing to take up his cross and say right out, 'I will?'"

Coming Out for Christ

He had not long to wait for a reply. One strong, manly voice, sounding forth the responsive dissyllable, gave courage to others, and the stream of "I will's" came thick and fast, while Mr. Moody, with choking utterances, interjected such encouraging remarks as "Thank God! I like these 'I will's,'" "Young men, you do not know how cheering this is: it is worth a whole lifetime of toil." "This is a joy that fills me full; thank God for giving you the courage to speak out." "Is there not another here who will take a bold stand for Christ? If a number of you were to come right out for God together, you could change the whole tone of this university. It makes men tremble when they see others coming out and boldly testifying for Jesus." "I could stand here all night and hear the 'I will's;' they are about the sweetest thing one can hear out of heaven."

He suggested that those sitting in the three front seats should vacate them, and that those who had spoken out should come, and kneeling there, in the sight of man, should dedicate themselves to the Lord. The request was scarcely uttered before some five or six rows of seats were filled with a solid phalanx of prostrate forms.

The Spirit's Power

The meeting for undergraduates, on Sunday night, was more wonderful than any that had gone before. Twelve hundred gathered in the Corn Exchange. The general demeanor of the gownsmen throughout the entire proceedings was all that could have been desired. Mr. Moody, in one long and unbroken stream of eloquent speech, summoned up as witnesses those whose opinions, either for or against the Son of God, are recorded in the New Testament. He dealt mighty blows at the modern idea that Christ was a great human teacher and nothing more. A large proportion of the students remained to the after-meeting, and the scene of Friday night was repeated on a still larger scale, but in a somewhat different form. Mr. Moody asked all who had the least desire to become Christians to proceed to a small side-gallery, where he would himself meet and talk with them. A stalwart young fellow at once arose and led the way, being quietly and quickly followed by a little crowd, until one hundred and fifty had taken their places with the evangelist in the midst, reasoning with and unfolding to them the truth; while from a group of Christian students and workers in the hall below, there went up many a touching and earnest petition that God would give light and peace to those who were in soul-anxiety.

The facts in this account of the famous revival appeared in the London Christian of November, 1882.

Jesus at Capernaum

How Jesus Kept the Sabbath

By Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts

INTERNATIONAL S. S. LESSON FOR MARCH 4th. MARK 1: 21-34

IT was a cheery sight, the Cross Roads farmers and their families stamping into Uncle Will's kitchen out of the roaring snowstorm, and ranging themselves, as if for a feast, around a big dining table in front of the open fire for their usual Sabbath evening home department study of the life of Jesus.

When the story had been read, verse about, Uncle Will, whose chief aims in these talks were illustration and application, asked, "What does this story teach us?"

Tom Brown, who, as we have said, was hoping to be a preacher and was therefore reading in his evenings the Chautauqua normal course by way of preparation, replied: "First of all, as this is a study of miracles, I think that we should define miracles, and if Uncle Will will permit me I will read a definition he wrote for me a while ago, that weaves together the four Bible words for miracles."

The definition was as follows: "Miracles are 'works' in the external, physical world, capable of being discerned by the senses, and incapable of being ascribed to any but a supernatural will and that divine, which are calculated to excite 'wonder,' and are of such a nature as to be 'signs' of the presence of a superhuman 'power' confirming the authority of a divine mission.

"Now," continued Tom, "as I am asked to give the first answer to Uncle Will's question, I will suggest that these miracles teach us that Christ was God. I do not forget that men of God wrought miracles by his aid. Miracles were God's seal that those who wrought them were his truthful witnesses. In the case of Christ the miracles assure us that he spoke the truth of himself when he said that he was the Son of God."

(As samples of Christ's testimony of himself the following were read from reference slips that Tom had passed to all who sat about the table: Matt. 11: 27; 21: 37; 22: 42; 26. 63 f.; 27: 43; Mark 12: 6; 13: 32; 14: 62; Luke 10: 22; John 5: 19-26; 9: 35-38; 10: 36; 11: 4; 14: 13; 17: 1; 19: 7.)

"In this story," said Uncle Will, "Christ wrought miracles not sparingly, as in his earlier ministry, but poured out his healing power like an overflowing fountain. I once read this wonderful story of that unprecedented Sabbath evening when he healed the multitude at the city gate, on the very ruins of Capernaum, which was blotted out because it rejected such evidence and such a deliverer."

"We have greater miracles to attest his words," said Tom's mother, "in the modern influence of Christ upon the world, that lifts, not one woman from a fever, but all women of Christian lands out of slavery into liberty and love."

Not doing nothing, but doing good is true Sabbath keeping

Uncle Will: "The supreme, unquestionable miracles that attest Christ as the way, the truth and the life to us are his matchless life, his matchless words, his matchless influence. There is little need to dwell on ancient miracles as seals of Christ's claims to-day, and almost any of the miracles can be used to teach the divinity of Christ, but this story of a Sabbath filled with miracles is the very best illustration in the New Testament of Christ's idea of Sabbath keeping. People commonly speak of the purposes of the Sabbath as if they were all included under the two words: rest and worship. But the Bible puts larger emphasis on two other purposes, namely, to give increased opportunities to do good, and to wean us from selfishness. In that fullest expression of God's Sabbath law (Isaiah 58: 13, 14), selfish pleasure and selfish work are alike forbidden on the Sabbath because we need to be turned away from all forms of selfishness totally one day in the week as a step toward altruism on all the days. But the one supreme lesson of this Capernaum story is that Christlike Sabbath keeping is not doing nothing, but doing good. Christ's chief purpose in what he said and did upon the Sabbath was to open out its neglected side, to show that it was positive as well as negative; that men should not only cease from their own work for money one day in seven, but that they should also on that day take a share in God's work of mercy. Incidentally he showed that works of necessity, such as watering an ox or rescuing him from a pit (Luke 13: 15), or getting a Sunday dinner of cracked wheat (Matt. 12: 1-8) were allowed by the law; but the miracles of mercy which he is recorded to have wrought on eight different Sabbaths in the four quarters of Palestine, and the discourses with which he accompanied them, were chiefly designed to teach us to rest, as God did, on the first Sabbath, by change of work, turning from work among minerals, vegetables, animals, to work for man, for the soul. As farmers rest their fields by change of crops, not by leaving the soil idle to the weeds, so the true rest for fertile minds—which will think and plan on secular things unless the displacing power of a new affection, a new enthusiasm, a new occupation, turns the thoughts into a new channel—is in a radical change of activities, such as Sabbath works of mercy bring after six days' work for money. Christ's example teaches us that idleness as well as business is Sabbath breaking; while Sabbath keeping requires such work as visiting the poor and sick and sinful, to do them good; such work as Christian instruction in the home and Sabbath School. 'It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day.' It is unlawful to spend it in showing an epitome of his talk with a picture of his Nazareth saw, such as Christ laid away when the Sabbath came.

Reform and Charity

Mr. Sanders, the Scotchman, said: "Bible stories are as many-sided as diamonds and full of light on every side, and I suggest that from this Capernaum story we might teach the two sides of Christian philanthropy, both appropriate to the Sabbath, and to every other day as well. As we see Christ healing the raging demoniac, we are reminded that he said: 'The Son of God was manifested that he might destroy the works of the devil'—a suitable moral for the aggressive Christian philanthropy of moral reforms. Then, as Christ turns to the healing of all manner of sick people, we see the first Christian hospital. Heathendom had hospitals for sacred animals, but none for men. The healing art itself is only a farce and fraud outside of Christian lands. We have too much decried 'humanitarianism,' fearing it would take the place of conversion; but true conversion will grow into humanitarianism."

worldly employments or in idleness. The Sabbath has been too much a day of don'ts. Its positive side has been too much neglected. Bad activities may be most easily displaced by good ones. The day is not only to be marked by a cessation of our work, but by a doing of God's work, especially in uplifting the sorrowful and sinful. Constantine, in his second edict about Sunday observance, applies Christ's Sabbath teachings most admirably when he says of the sacred day: 'It is most grateful and pleasing that those things should be done on it that are most desirable. Therefore it is our pleasure that all our ministers have leave to emancipate and manumit on that holy day, and enter all such acts as concern the same.' Christ loosed on the Sabbath those bound with infirmities; Constantine made it a weekly emancipation day; so should Christians of to-day use it to relieve the body and soul, by works of mercy."

Uncle Will turned the home blackboard, and showed the farmer that the desperado had become a changed man. 'Well,' said he, 'if what you say is true, I have only one wish, and that is to see Africaner before I die; and when you return I will go with you to see him, although he killed my own uncle.' At this announcement Dr. Moffat was somewhat embarrassed; but at length he told the secret, and, conducting the farmer to the wagon, pointed to the chief and said: 'This is Africaner.' The farmer then exclaimed: 'O God, what a miracle of thy power! What cannot thy grace accomplish?'"

"After conversion," said Mother Manson, "we should all minister to Christ. The ministry of Peter's wife's mother was no doubt with pots and kettles, from which she joyfully fed the Christ who had saved her, and his apostles. Whatever we do in the right spirit, as unto Christ, is ministry. The old colored washerwoman, who sang as she climbed the stairs after a weary day at the tub, 'One more day's work for Jesus,' understood true religion better than many a rich idler in silks and satins. No one, however rich has any right to be idle."

"How can we children minister to Christ?" asked Mabel, Uncle Will's grandchild of sixteen.

"You can be little ministers," said Uncle Will, "as Samuel was, whose work was to trim lamps and run errands for the high priest, by doing just such work at home in obedience to mother, who is God's lieutenant to give you orders for him. And you can speak and sing for him among your playmates and neighbors. And even school tasks will be glorified if you study in order to be better able to serve Christ and to be more useful."

Selah Brown, merriest of the farmers, who had been unusually silent and solemn all this evening, now spoke:

"All through this story of Capernaum I have been thinking of how that city rejected Christ, although he wrought more miracles to win them in that 'his own city,' than in any other. Not bitterly, but with tears, Christ tells of the judgment for rejected light which the city thus brought upon itself. 'And thou Capernaum, which art exalted unto heaven, shalt be brought down to hell; for if the mighty works which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom it would have remained until this day' (Matt. 11: 23). The plain meaning of this awful warning is that respectable sinners who have disregarded the 'Come unto me' of Christ as repeated by Christian parents and earnest teachers and faithful pastors, who by education have come to know the mighty works Christ has wrought in men and nations, and yet have refused to accept him as Saviour and Master, will find their case less tolerable in the judgment of a just God than those whose sins have been more gross, but against less of light. Who of all the earth have been more exalted to heaven in Christian privileges than we, who as individuals and as a nation have so often rejected Christ, rejected him by individual sin, rejected him by the unchristian acts of our professedly Christian nation? For the individual, the judgment belongs partly to the future world, and I am old fashioned enough to believe that Christ did not exaggerate it when he represented respectable sinners, charged with no sin but a life of selfishness, as 'tormented' in 'hell' with the memory of such a life (Luke 16). For nations the judgment is all in this world, and the fallen pillars of Capernaum and of Babylon are but types of the deeper moral ruin that rejection of the real teachings of Christ has brought of late on Spain and France. 'Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel' was spoken first to the nation, but the warning belongs also to every soul. My soul at least shall not reject but welcome the Christ who comes to us with nineteen Christian centuries, like gems in his crown.

"'Be swift my soul to answer him, be jubilant my feet,
For God is marching on.'"

Saved to Serve

"That is about what I would teach from the story," said Mother Manson. "I would make it a picture of conversion and ministry. Peter's wife's mother being healed, at once used her strength in service. You remember Jesus said that he healed the palsied man in order that the people might know he had power to forgive sins (Mark 2: 10, 11). His miracles were chiefly for the soul. That demoniac pictures the sinner 'unclean' and 'torn' with sin—a slave to the devil, even though believing that Christ is the Son of God. Both devils and devilish men 'believe and tremble.' Sickness in the others healed appropriately pictures sin, for sickness is mostly due to sin. But Christ, mightier than devils, Conqueror of disease, saved these people, body and soul. I heard a reformed man, after a year of Christian life, say that every cell of his body had been converted, and he looked it. More wonderful than the healing of the Capernaum demoniac was the conversion, a few weeks ago, of Mr. A. O. Waggoner of Toledo, an infidel who burned his infidel library lest its thoughts should, like demons, possess other souls."

Mrs. Sanders: "You remind me of another modern demoniac healed, as related in the life of Dr. Moffat, and now especially appropriate with all eyes on South Africa. When Rev. Dr. Moffat had labored for nearly nine years in Great Namaqualand with scarcely any visible results, he saw the first fruits of his toil in the conversion of Africaner, the notorious Hottentot chief and freebooter. This savage and warlike chieftain had for many years been the scourge and terror of the whole country but when he came under the influence of the Gospel he was convinced of sin and wept like a child. His attachment to his teacher was great, and when Dr. Moffat went to Capetown Africaner requested permission to accompany him. Dr. Moffat consented, although he knew the experiment would involve some risk, as several parts of the country through which they would pass had been laid waste by the robber chieftain before he was converted. At various places surprise was expressed by the Dutch Boers at seeing Dr. Moffat once more, as they had heard that he had been murdered by Africaner. At one place the missionary ventured to mention the fact of Africaner's conversion, when a Dutch farmer answered: 'I can believe almost anything you say, but that I cannot credit. There are seven wonders in the world; that would be the eighth!' Dr.

White and Native Races

The Women of South Africa

The Streets of Cape Town

HALF-CASTE MALAY WOMAN

TEA-FACTORY COOLIE GIRLS OF NATAL

A MALAY BRIDE, CAPE TOWN

THE last year of the century opens as a year of sorrow for the women of South Africa. Bereaved homes, the anguish of widows and orphans, privations, hardships and all the horrors that follow in the wake of war, have combined to convert the present time into one of the darkest pages in the Dark Continent's troubled history.

The struggle has been between the white races, and on white women and children the burdens have fallen, rather than upon native; although it is to be supposed that the Kaffir, or Zulu, servants of the Boers have necessarily participated in their master's misfortunes. A large proportion of labor on the Boer farms is performed by Kaffirs; and since they are as yet uncivilized and by no means industrious, the barren, unprosperous appearance of the average Boer farm may in some measure be attributed to this fact. The Kaffirs preserve all their old superstitions; they are polygamous; and among the free Zulu tribes, the number of a chief's wives is limited only by his ability to pay for them; the price of a wife is so many head of cattle, according to paternal valuation.

While on the Boer farms, frouws show the lack of culture consequent upon isolation, the younger generation of women have had, as a rule, greater advantages than their mothers and grandmothers; many are mistresses of French, music and various other accomplishments acquired at college and through residence in Bloomfontein, Grahamstown, Johannesburg, Cape Town and other African cities. It happened that some Boer maids lost their hearts to young Englishmen (who are now, perhaps, wearing red coats and carrying arms for the English queen), and hence many an African home is to-day a house of divided sympathies, the wife and mother a Boer, the husband and father a Briton. Sturdy and strong and home-loving are these women of the veldt, whether they be schooled in the fine arts, or only in such crafts as make the farmhouse comfortable according to unexacting Boer requirements; hospitable are they, too, and a warm welcome is ready for all comers—save the English. Early rising, family worship, work in the house by the women, work among the cattle and the hunting of game by the men, evening prayers and early slumbers form the routine of Boer farm-life in times of peace. Tidiness has never been named in the list of Boer virtues; but water is a luxury, of firewood to make it boil there is next to none, and criticism would be unjust. The average Boer home is low, one-storied; the door is on a level with the ground, and in and out the chickens wander at will, and perhaps lay and hatch in some cozy corner of the dining-room or kitchen. This description does not apply to the Boer home near the cities. In the vicinity of Cape Town, many picturesque white mansions mark the spots where Boers have made themselves attractive dwellings; this is also true of other localities.

A TYPICAL GROUP IN SOUTH AFRICA

ZULU BRIDAL COSTUME

Life in Johannesburg, Port Elizabeth, Durban and Cape Town is, of course, a very different thing from the life of the veldt or from life in Pretoria. Indeed, Cape Town is about as cosmopolitan as New York. A visitor to Cape Town before the war thus describes his first impressions of the South African capitol, which he reached on a fete day: "I was astonished at the great variety of gay costumes among the motley crowd—English, Dutch, Germans and French; Malays, Indian Coolies, Kaffirs and Hottentots—a tremendous gathering, in fact, of all nations and 'all sorts' and 'conditions of men.'" The Dutch are not in such evidence now, but for the rest the streets of the city present even a more varied and stirring appearance than formerly. Daily, big warships come in bringing soldiers; the Highlanders go piping through the streets; the loaded trains bear out company after company to the front, while the bands play and people cheer and wave their handkerchiefs.

American men and women are there on special missions of mercy; for the American hospital ship Maine, with her American surgeons and nurses on board, lately reached port and has been hospitably receiving the sick and wounded, both British and Boer.

In spite of war, and perhaps in greater degree because of the stirring times and larger crowds, the street peddlers ply their usual trades; and the sweetmeat seller, the flower seller and the trinket seller have no particular cause to mourn, because canons are thundering in the remote region of the Tugela River.

The Malay bride arrays herself as gorgeously in crinolined skirt and wonderful bodice and crown, gay with tinsel ornaments and flowers, and as merry a company comes to her wedding, where a Mohammedan priest officiates, as if there were no war. But there is mourning among the whites in Cape Town, for trains that go out to the music of the band and the cheer of the populace, sometimes come back bringing the wounded and the dying.

There is mourning in Johannesburg, the City of Gold and in Durban and Pietermaritzburg, although the swarthy coolie girls go so merrily about their accustomed tasks; and we know the shadow that hangs over Ladysmith and Mafeking and Bloomfontein and Pretoria, and the desolate Boer farms where women and children watch and wait and grieve; and we pray that the God of battles may bring peace quickly to our brethren, the Briton and the Boer and to the troubled homes in England and in Africa. Will the native tribes become involved in the present war? Zulus are cruel fighters; besides much agricultural work is done by Kaffirs; and it would be unfortunate for all races if a scarcity of food should add itself to the woes of the situation. The Kaffir, however, is not the only laborer on the African plantations where sugar-cane and tea and Kaffir corn are grown. The Indian coolies are the most efficient help that the Natal and Cape Colony planter has yet found: in the sugar and tea factories in towns, their service is invaluable. Little coolie, as well as Kaffir, maids, serve attendance on ladies in Ladysmith, Durban and other places, and give a somewhat Hindu expression to African surroundings. The Zulu is a nobler-looking creature than the coolie; centuries of savagery have made him a hunter and a fighter rather than a toiler. But of his wife the contrary is true, for upon her fell all the agricultural and manual labor. In the kraals the women are always up early, grinding corn between stones, making mealie-porridge, sweeping with primitive brush-brooms in front of their huts; bringing water—usually from a long distance—and working in the field where maize is struggling for existence. Tidying the huts, after a fashion, is part of the day's work.

Preference for Things Easy

THE tendency of our period is to study the things and to do the things that we prefer. We refer all questions to the taste and the sensibilities. There are great subjects that ought to be studied; great problems that ought to be solved; great achievements that ought to be attained by young Americans. If we fancy them, it is all right; if we think it will pay, it is all right. And right here, sometimes, war is a godsend. It comes with the pressure of a new obligation. It comes with its deprivations and sacrifices, with its hardships, with its sorrow and death. Lieut. Colonel Guy Howard is shot from ambuscade; Major John A. Logan at the head of his column. They die, but the iron that was in their blood flows in the veins of their children and their children's children; fructifies to the end of time. These young men met an obligation. They will have perpetual youth in all their posterity to the latest generation.

Morality is right conduct springing from right motives; from obedience to the voice of God within us, which says: "Thou shalt! Thou shalt not!" Ethics began in the Garden of Eden. God said of a garden full of fruit-trees, "Thou shalt!" and of a single one, "Thou shalt not!" That was man's first lesson in ethics. God has always been generous to his creatures. He gives us six days and he takes only one. But that one is better to us, because it is his, than if it were ours. Of that one day, which is his, he says: "Thou shalt not!" He lets us fill the earth with houses, which we may rent and live in; gives us the lumber and the stone, and he says of a single house: "It is mine; make it not a den of thieves." And what God reserves to himself, here also, is better for us, than what he gives to us. We get more out of his inhibitory commands than out of his permissive ones. Out of the permissive ones, we get enjoyment; out of the inhibitory, strength. When we have kept the inhibitory ones, the next time we pass that way, we can say with Samson: "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness."

When, in his proclamation, the President asked us to thank God for "steady gain in the moral and educational growth of our national character," he meant this: that the churches and the schools are doing their work better year by year. There is certainly great advance in the philosophy of educational work; we know better how to teach; how to make learning simpler and more attractive; to make the process more analytic and logical. Whether we have the same august sanctions to duty, is another question. Ethics, of course, take their authority and dignity from the motive. On the gate-posts of Harvard University is this inscription:

"After God had carried us safe to New England, and we had builded our houses and provided necessaries for our livelihood, reared convenient places for God's worship and settled the civil government, one of the next things we longed for and looked after was to advance learning and perpetuate it to posterity, dreading to leave an illiterate ministry to the churches when our present ministers shall lie in the dust." This was the motive which led to the founding of Harvard University. It was to prepare men competent to educate the people in intellect, in morals, in the Scriptures. For then, the Pulpit was in a double sense the High School. The minister gave the law as from the seat of a judge.

But illiteracy, bad as it is, is not the only danger. If we cut off the highest sanctions from our ethics; if we do not connect God with them; if we regard them as the product of civilization, of evolution, of anything less august, less authoritative than God himself, they cannot endure the strain of a period of such vast ambitions and activities as our own. Martin Luther felt commanded of God to be Martin Luther. Oliver Cromwell felt commanded of God to rectify matters in the reign of Charles the First; to take off the crown of king, even though a head should come off with it.

The Function of Conscience

RELIGION cannot be without conscience. Aesthetics are good and beautiful; art in architecture, gracefulness in forms of worship. But we have gone very far in this direction. In Congregational and Presbyterian churches, that once protested so loudly against art-decorations in houses of worship; in Methodist churches, that insisted so strongly against too much intellectual culture, all things are changed. Within their stately stone structures, most Protestant churches are studying how to make outward things more attractive; are addressing the "itching ears" of the latter-day assemblies, and give less and less attention to the claims of conscience. How few congregations go away asking themselves after their spiritual state and probable destiny! How few saying, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" How long can this last, without degeneracy in religion. In these days, too many people disbelieve the truth; too many are indifferent to it. But the multitude follows the preachers whose lips drop soft things, and the choirs that do up their work aesthetically. It is truth addressed to the conscience that breaks up the fallow ground, and prepares men for the great realities of another life. The Welsh have a hymn that has in it this stanza:

The preacher has learning and eloquent tone,
Appropriate his prayers addressing God's throne;
But sinners are thoughtless and saints are all cold,
Just as if the Gospel had never been told.
Heart-searching Amen! converting Amen!
Return to our meetings, revive us again!

The Young Man's Peril

YOU wonder that so many young men are ruined. The wonder is so many escape. When I see a young man in city with eye, and lip, and brawn of arm, and stalwartness of frame indicating that he has fought the temptations of city life and conquered, I can hardly keep from crying "bravo!" though he be a stranger. Under temptation how many thousands of young men have made eternal shipwreck! Do you know the struggles that young men in our cities go through, whether in high life or low life? One day a fast young man of Wall street dropped a memorandum, in which he was keeping an account of his expenses. This was the diary of one day, September 3. He was a young man in "high life":

Breakfast at Delmonico's	$6.00
Omnibus to Wall street	.10
Sundries to facilitate business affairs	5.00
Bet and lost a hat	10.00
To a poor boy	.05
Luncheon at Delmonico's	2.00
Refreshments in the afternoon	2.00
Omnibus going up town	.10
Dinner at the Hoffman House and wines	9.00
Carriage for self and lady	10.00
Ice cream for the lady	1.00
Having brought lady home, went to Blank's and lost	22.00
Went to Smith's to regain what I had lost at Blank's and lost again	47.00
Left Smith's and took another carriage	3.50
Total expenses for September 3..	$115.75

On a large scale and in high life that memorandum illustrates what is being done in our great cities, and on a small scale in the lives of humbler persons who have not the same means. "My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not. Surely in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird." Whether they are lifted by your Christian parents, or by your business friends, or by some Christian minister, watch the storm signals.

Will They Stand It?

THERE has somehow got abroad an impression among our young ministers that the people will not take the unadulterated Gospel. It is thought that instead of the theory that men are corrupt and unsavable, save through Christ, we must flatter them with the idea that there is good enough in them, "if it could only be brought out." We must flatter them, and tell them what fine fellows they are, and that if they have a little fixing up they will be all right. Hence, religion is often presented as a weak sentimentality, rather than an infinite necessity, without which they drop down forever. To please the fastidious taste of the day, we must make our sermon a sort of cream meringue, light and frothy and sweet, and almost vanishing at the touch of a spoon.

O vast mistake! The people are hungry for a stout Gospel with bones in it. The greatest novelty for an audience now is repentance and faith. The people are ready to hear all about heaven and hell if we are not too great cowards to speak it. Do not let us be patting them on the backs when we ought to be rousing their souls. The Gospel is incisive. Husking time comes in the corn-fields, but we cannot bring out the golden ear, save with a sharp peg. Conviction before conversion.

Cheered by Samantha

Dear "Herald": KALAMAZOO, MICH.

I like Samantha's story, too,
As well as other readers do;
And follow her around the earth,
Because I do not doubt her worth;
For she is gifted, full of fun,
And at all evil fires her gun,
So I shall be a friend for life
Unto "Josiah Allen's wife."—ROSE TIFT.

HAMBURGH, N. J.

Dear Sir:—Aunt Samantha is one of the best and most fearless advocates against all the moral evils of the day, and none can excel her on the temperance question. I can learn more from reading her books on the World's Fair than I could to have been there one week; and I expect to get a great deal of valuable information from her tour around the world, besides being made more cheery and pleasant by her unique way of telling it.

Dear Mr. Editor:—I enjoy the paper very much and feel as though I had missed a good deal in not taking it before. It is full of good things, prominent among which is Samantha. We think the story is fine, and I think a word of praise is due to the artist.

Dr. Sheldon's Experiment

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is making special arrangements to facilitate the prompt handling by the Topeka Capital of the names of those CHRISTIAN HERALD subscribers who order, through us, the six numbers of the Capital issued under Mr. Sheldon's direction. As the tremendous temporary increase of the Capital subscription list will unquestionably interfere with prompt service, unless specially facilitated, we have concluded to send to the Capital six printed mailing lists, containing the carefully printed names and full addresses of members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD family who subscribe for the six Sheldon issues. This course will insure the promptest service and avoid the inaccuracies which necessarily creep in when wrappers are addressed by the pen. To secure this advantage the names of all subscribers for the Sheldon issues (commencing March 13), should be sent in to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, together with twenty-five cents in cash, to reach us not later than Saturday morning, March 10th.

BRIEF NOTES

Lady Henry Somerset has issued a call for June 23, 1900, to be observed as a devotional day around the world. The World's W. C. T. U. will be "in convention assembled."

The oldest teetotaler is said to be Mrs. Sampson, aged ninety-seven. She was born at King's Lynn, and signed the pledge in January, 1820. She had ten daughters, and the eight still living are teetotalers.

On January 8, Rev. Thomas Spurgeon related to his congregation the story of the conversion of his father, the late Pastor C. H. Spurgeon, which occured just fifty years ago in a Primitive Methodist chapel at Colchester.

A rumor is current that an imperative demand on the Foreign Office of China has been made by the United States, Great Britain, Germany, France and Italy that China make satisfactory provision for the safety of the lives and property of missionaries in that land.

The increase of drunkenness among women was emphasized in a speech recently made by Mr. Robert Graham, of the Church Temperance Society. He said that of the 46,170 persons arrested for drunkenness in New York City during 1898, 10,589 were women.

The death of Judge Enoch L. Fancher, President of the American Bible Society, which occurred on Feb. 9, is widely deplored among a large circle of friends. Though eighty-three years of age, the deceased judge was an active member of many religious societies, and he will be sorely missed.

Arrangements have been made with Mr. Mason, of Los Angeles, Cal., who is one of the Christian Endeavor tourists who sailed from New York on Feb. 10 for a tour in Palestine, Italy, Greece, etc., for a series of articles and photographs describing the tour, to appear in this journal.

Rev. Edward Everett Hale, of Boston, Mass., announced to his congregation on Sunday, Feb. 4, that in future at communion services water would be used instead of wine. Dr. Hale has advocated the change for several years, and at last has secured the consent of the officers of the church.

Countess Schimmelmann delivered an address recently in the Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., in which she spoke of the influence of Gospel hymns in evangelistic work. The first impulse to her present self-denying labors came from hearing one of Ira D. Sankey's solos.

At the twenty-sixth annual meeting of the board of trustees of Chautauqua Assembly which was recently held at Cleveland, O., it was announced that there had been a gain in assets of nearly $150,000 over those reported last year. The endowment fund has reached $50,000, and will be increased to $100,000 by May 1.

A bargain of interest to Sunday Schools and Young People's Societies is offered by the owners of a fine exhibition stereopticon who are willing to sell it cheap. It is full-nickeled, has dissolving key and complete outfit. Cost originally $400. Suitable for church, Sunday School or lecture hall. Apply "Stereopticon," THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York.

Evangelist William Phillips Hall, known as "the business-man evangelist," has been holding a series of two weeks' union meetings in Passaic, N. J. The union brought together seven evangelical churches. Dr. John T. Wells continued the meetings after Mr. Hall's departure. The churches have received additions to the membership which are still increasing.

The Foreign Missionary Tables prepared by the Missionary Review show a total of 15,019 missionaries in heathen lands. Of these, 4,718 are sent from America. The income of European Foreign Mission Societies last year was $9,241,711, and of American Societies $5,522,900. The number of communicants added to churches in heathen lands last year was 79,759.

An instance of Christian heroism is quoted by a western journal. It states that Miss Jennie Dunn, of Wyman, Ia., who held the position of ticket agent on a railroad, recently received notice that she must attend at the station on the Lord's Day. She protested and explained that it was against her religious principles to do such work on Sunday, but was told that she must comply or resign. She promptly sent in her resignation.

The Canal in Diplomacy

ONE obstacle to the realization of the scheme of a canal across the isthmus of Panama, is removed by the convention between the Washington Government and Great Britain, which the President has sent to the Senate for ratification. Every ggestion that our government can ruct that much-needed waterway, has therto been met with the reminder that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty negotiated in 50, the United States was under engagement not to build the canal. The convention now negotiated, explicitly abrogates that clause of the old treaty, and gives the United States the right to construct the canal and control it afterwards. Certain conditions are attached to the concession. The United States is pledged to refrain from fortifying the entrances to the canal, and to adopt the same principles for its control as are in force in the use of the Suez Canal, which have been found to work satisfactorily. It is also stipulated that the canal shall be held in absolute neutrality in peace and in war. In no case shall there be any obstacle to ships of war passing through the canal at any time, but no vessel may take refuge in the canal. It must proceed through and under no circumstances remain in the waterway more than twenty-four hours. The convention, of course, is being carefully criticised, and it evidently will not receive the approval of the Senate without struggle. The chief objections urged against it are on the neutrality clauses. The opponents of the convention contend that if the United States constructs the canal and controls it, it should also have the power of closing it whensoever it deems right, especially in time of war. Otherwise, in the event of the United States being at war with some naval power, our government would be in the ridiculous position of having provided a waterway, through which its enemy's ships might pass to attack our western coasts. This objection may cause the rejection of the convention, although it is not so serious as it appears. Our fleets would surely form a cordon at the entrance or the exit of the canal, which would be quite as effective as fortifications. At the same time it seems reasonable that if we go to the expense of constructing the canal, we should own it absolutely and should not have to obtain or give guarantees to any European power on the subject. The only need for such a convention as has been negotiated, is that we have a respect for our international obligations and having given pledges in a former treaty, we would not repudiate them without the consent of the other contracting party. This convention has the merit of affording us escape from the vexatious position described by the Psalmist:

He that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not (Ps. 15:4).

ROUTE OF PROJECTED NICARAGUA CANAL

Death Discloses a Secret

A strange story lies behind a bill that Senator Quarles of Wisconsin has introduced in the United States Senate. It is a bill granting a pension to a lady living at Stevens Point, Wis. It appears that shortly before the outbreak of the civil war she met a young man from the East, to whom she became engaged. He enlisted in a Wisconsin regiment and went to the front, promising to marry her when the war was over. They corresponded during the war and at its close the soldier returned, severely wounded, but with an honorable record for good service. They were married and she nursed him back to health. He secured a pension and with that and the profits of his business they made a comfortable living. He died recently, leaving her with eight children to support. She made application for the pension due to a soldier's widow, but to her surprise, her application was rejected. The Pension Office, in investigating her claim, discovered that she had not been the legal wife of the soldier. Before marrying her, he had married a girl in a town in New York State, who, hearing that he had fallen in battle, had married another man. The news of the soldier's duplicity was a great shock to the widow in Wisconsin, who, during all the years since the war, had lived happily with him, never doubting that she was his legal wife. The only way that she can get the pension that she certainly deserves, is, therefore, by special legislation, as the Pension Office is bound by its rules to recognize the claims only of those widows who were legally married to the soldiers. Every one perceives the necessity of such a rule, though many appear to forget the principle in spiritual matters. It is often contended that at the last judgment, conduct will be the only test, ignoring the fact that only those who are joined in living union to Christ, will be recognized by him.

Then shall ye begin to say, we have eaten and drunk in thy presence and thou hast taught in our streets: but he shall say, I tell you I know you not (Luke 13:26).

Fears for the Exposition

A cable dispatch from the French capital to the New York Herald, says there are good reasons for stating that the Exposition authorities are anxious on account of the River Seine, which, in rising, has done considerable damage already to some of the buildings along the banks. One of the wings of the building for the Palais de Electricite, has sunk nearly three metres (about ten feet), on account of the infiltrations of water. The architects are said to be not certain that they can restore the building to its former condition. On the other hand, the banks, where there are several lighter sorts of constructions, are not considered in danger unless the river rises higher. The French people, as a whole, do not pay much heed to Biblical teachings, but if the fears in this dispatch are realized, they will regret that one Biblical warning has been disregarded:

A foolish man who built his house upon the sand and the rain descended and the floods came and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell; and great was the fall of it (Matt. 7:27).

Books Germ-bearers

A press dispatch from Scranton, Pa., states that the Albright Public Library has been closed by order of the Board of Health, which announces an epidemic of scarlet fever and diphtheria in the city. It is the opinion of the board that the germs of these diseases are carried from house to house by circulating libraries and so in the hope of stopping the epidemic this radical step was taken. No one seems to know when the library will be reopened to the public. The measure was opposed to the last by the directors of the library, who did not think that the theory of the Board of Health was either reasonable or correct. The health board said that it had received information from a Western city that at least one case of scarlet fever had been traced to books secured in a public library. What has occurred once may occur again, therefore the board felt justified in taking the extreme step of closing the library. It may be hoped that like vigilance is exercised to prevent books getting into circulation which contain the germs of sin, which are much more frequently found in books and are more pernicious than even the germs of disease. There are books in existence so injurious that it would be well if the owners dealt with them as the Ephesians dealt with the corrupt literature of their day.

Many of them brought their books together and burned them before all men (Acts 19:19).

PORTAL IN PARIS EXPOSITION

SCENE IN MANAGUA, THE CAPITAL OF NICARAGUA

A Human Life-line

The presence of mind and personal courage of some young men prevented the drowning of three young girls, at Patchogue, L. I., a short time ago. The girls belonged to a party of skaters who went on the lake during the recent cold spell. The ice seemed firm and bore very well until the party crowded to one place. It proved to be thin there, and the girls fell through. Their friends drew back, screaming for help. There were several young men on the ice, but they perceived the danger of attempting a rescue. The ice around the hole where the girls fell through was already covered several inches deep with water, and was sagging dangerously. One of the young men proposed a life-line, and his plan was put in operation. He lay down on the ice, and another young man took firm hold of his ankles; a third lay behind, holding him, and so on from the bank to within a few feet of the hole. Then the hinder men pushed the forward ones nearer until the foremost could reach over and grasp one of the drowning girls. He gave a shout and the life-line was pulled in and the girl carried to the bank. The life-line was again pushed out and another girl was rescued. By this time the ice was breaking all around, but a third time the life-line was pushed forward, though the foremost of the young men was almost covered by the water above the ice, and the last girl—then unconscious, but still holding the edge of the ice—was drawn out. It was a noble thing to do and the young men deserve to be congratulated on the success of their efforts. It is much to be wished that when souls are in peril, there might always be such intelligent and united effort to save them that was made in this case. Many might be saved if the Lord's people united intelligently as these young men did.

If a man be overtaken in a fault, ye who are spiritual restore such an one in the spirit of meekness (Gal. 6:1).

Legally Dead Though Alive

A remarkable decision has been rendered in the Circuit Court of Atlanta, Ga. It practically pronounces a man dead in the eyes of the law, though he was present in court and his identity was fully established. The suit before the court was brought by a man who claimed a share in the estate of his father, who died some years ago in Georgia. After his death the estate was divided among the heirs on the presumption that this son, who had long been absent and for many years had held no communication with his family, was dead. The plaintiff testified that he was in Texas when his father died, and he did not know of the death until he returned to Georgia in 1896. The judge dismissed his claim. He said that a man who absents himself from his home and severs all communication with his family, should not complain if they regard him as dead and proceed on that assumption. Besides, though according to his own admission, he knew in 1896 of his father's death, he suffered three years to elapse before he sued. The court, therefore, refused to entertain his claim. Perhaps this decision may be reversed on appeal, but it shows how a man of common sense regards one who is remiss in attending to his own interests. Yet how many men of common sense neglect to avail themselves of the greatest blessing that could be offered to men and do so from year to year until they come to die!

Therefore we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, lest at any time we should let them slip (Heb. 2:1).

In a Tropical Eden

WELL, the Queen havin' been tended to I begun to turn my attention onto the volcano, and some of the rest of the party too felt that they couldn't leave the islands without seein' the great Kilauea and some didn't care to go. I felt that I must see it and so did Arvilly, and Josiah looked on me as fondly and proudly as if I myself wuz a volcano and said, "If Samantha goes I shall." Robert Strong wanted to go and so did Dorothy; Miss Meechim didn't feel like going and offered to take care of Tommy with the help of Aronette. Elder Wessel wouldn't go, for Lucia wuzn't very well and he felt that she had better stay and rest at the tarven, and I spozed that Aronette and Lucia would have a pretty good time, for they always seemed to when they wuz together. Evangeline Noble was visiting some friends of hers on the island. There wuz a smart young English clergyman goin' with us and a Scotchman, both good lookin' and good actin'. The Scotchman wuz Sir Duncan Ramsey and didn't act any more sot up than if he wuz a plain mister. He paid considerable attention to Dorothy, too, but Miss Meechim said that she didn't worry about Dorothy at all since I would chaperone her, and Robert wuz going to protect her from any possible lover. Sez Miss Meechim:

"Robert knows that I would almost rather have that volcano burst forth its burning lava and wash her away on its bosom, than to have her engulfed in that terrible state of matrimony from which I and mine have suffered so horribly."

"Well," sez I, "I can't speak for you and yourn, but for me and ourn," sez I, "no state under the heavens would be agreeable for me to live in if my beloved pardner wuzn't in it too."

"Oh, well," sez she, "exceptions prove the rule: your husband is congenial and good to you."

"Oh, well," sez I, "as to the daily acts and queer moves of pardners the least said the soonest mended, but Love is the great ruler; where he rules any state is blest, be it torrid or frigid."

That evenin' Arvilly and Elder Wessel had a argument about votin' and other things. I knew I ort to be in my room packin' my satchel bag, for we expected to be gone a week or ten days, but I did kinder want to hear how their talk come out. He said he didn't vote; he said that he thought it wuz a clergyman's duty to set and judge of the right and wrong of actions, not take part in 'em.

Arvilly is Aroused

And Arvilly says, "I always spozed the Almighty did that; I didn't know as human men wuz obleeged to. I know he cursed them that dealt in strong drink, and blest them that gin even a cup of cold water to the little ones, which I spoze meant help to the poorest and lowest. And I guess that whatever your idees are about it, when you come to the judgment day you won't set up there on the throne judgin', but you'll be down with the rest on us givin' an account of how you've used your talents, your influence, and if you've wropped your mantilly of protection around thieves and murderers that you know the whiskey trade is made of, you'll find that it will drop off there, and you will be judged accordin' to your works. But mebby you'll be made to see before you git there that you're in the wrong on't upholdin' this evil."

Arvilly's axent wuz as sharp as any simeter, and it seemed to go right through Elder Wessel's robe of complacency and self esteem and rend it. He looked dretful bad, and I spoke up, meanin' to pour a little ile on his woonds, and sayin' what I thought, too. Sez I:

"Folks hain't so guilty often as they are thoughtless; ministers and church people who don't use their influence aginst this evil don't realize what they're doin'—they don't think."

"They're guilty if they don't think," sez Arvilly, "if they are blest with common sense. If I wuz walkin' by a deep pond in broad daylight, and see a dozen little children sinking that I might save by a little effort, I wonder how many would believe me when I said that I see 'em drowndin' but didn't try to save 'em because I didn't think. If I had ears and eyes and common sense, and could save 'em and didn't, I wuz guilty of murder, and so the Lord would look at it and everybody else that knew anything." And she looked at me some as if I didn't know anything, jest because I intimated that ministers and church members didn't want to do such wickedness, but didn't think—Arvilly is hash. But I had to admit that she had some common sense on her side. Sez she agin:

"The Church of Christ could do anything it wanted to, if it jined its forces, took holt as if it meant to do sunthin', but as it is, indifference folds its hands, self interest murders humanity, greed upholds intemperance, and all about us in Church and State are drink makers and drink takers, and heaven knows which of 'em will git to hell first!" Arvilly is hash; when she gits rousted up her indignation is like lightnin', and she don't care where it strikes or who. It struck Elder Wessel hard.

"I should be afraid!" sez he, and his voice fairly trembled with indignation. "I should be afraid to talk of the Church of Christ as you do!"

"Let it behave itself then!" sez Arvilly, "be converted and come out on the Lord's side to the help of the weak aginst the mighty!"

"The saloon," sez Elder Wessel dogmatically, "is the Poor Man's Club." He wuz all rousted up by her hash talk and come out plainer than he had come.

Elder Wessel's Plea

"The rich man has his club, and the saloon is the Poor Man's Club. He has a right to go there for a little recreation."

"Re-creation!" sez Arvilly. "If you think drinkin' pizen whiskey is re-creatin' a man, you're different from me."

"And me, too," sez I. "If you call it re-creatin' to go to the Poor Man's Club sober and sane," sez Arvilly, "and stagger home at midnight crazy drunk, I say he hain't no right to re-create himself that way; he re-creates himself from a good man and worthy member of society into a fiend, a burden and terror to his family and community. Now Elder White's idee of re-creatin' men is different: he believes in takin' bad men and re-creatin' 'em into good ones, and I wish that every minister on earth would go and do likewise."

"IF SAMANTHA GOES, I SHALL," SEZ JOSIAH

"I know nothin' about Elder White," sez Elder Wessel hautily.

"He's our minister in Loontown," sez Arvilly. "He has his church open every night in the week for re-creatin' in the right way."

"I don't approve of that," sez Elder Wessel. "The church of the Most High is too sacred to use for such purposes."

"A minister said that once to Elder White," sez Arvilly, "and he answered 'em with that warm meller smile of hisen. 'Where are my boys and girls more welcome and safe than at home, and this is their Father's house.'" sez he.

"Using that holy place for recreation is very wrong," sez Elder Wessel.

Sez Arvilly, "I told you that he used it to re-create anew to goodness and strength. He has music, good books, innocent ga[illegible]s of all kinds, bright lights, warmth, ch[illegible]ful society, good lectures, and an atm[illegible]sphere of good helpful influences roundin' 'em, and he has sandwiches [illegible] coffee served in what wuz the paste[illegible] study, and which he uses now. Hea[illegible] knows, to study the big problem ho[illegible] minister of the Most High can do the m[illegible] good to his people."

"Coffee," sez Elder Wessel, "is all ri[illegible] in its place, but the common workm[illegible] hankers after something stronger: [illegible] wants his beer or toddy, the glass t[illegible] makes him forget his trouble for a ti[illegible], and lifts him into another world."

"Well, I spoze the opium eater [illegible] cocaine fiend hanker after the fool p[illegible]dise these drugs take 'em into, but th[illegible] no sign that they ort to destroy themsel[illegible] with 'em."

"Coffee, too, is deleterious," sez El[illegible] Wessel. "Some say that it is worse t[illegible] whiskey."

I spoke up then; I am a good cof[illegible] maker everybody admits, and I could[illegible] bear to hear Ernest White talked agi[illegible] and I sez: "I never hearn of a workm[illegible] drinkin' so much coffee that he wuz[illegible] danger to his family and the communi[illegible] or so carried away with it that he sp[illegible] his hull wages on it. Such talk is fool[illegible] and only meant to blind the eyes of j[illegible]tice and common sense. Elder Whit[illegible] Mutual Help Club, as he calls it, for[illegible] makes these folks think they help h[illegible] and mebby they do, as doin' sights [illegible] good, sights of it. Young folks who w[illegible] well started towards the drunkard's p[illegible] have been turned right round by it, a[illegible] they save their wages and look like d[illegible]ferent men since they have left the Po[illegible] Man's Club, as you call it, and patron[illegible]hisen."

Who is Responsible?

"And Elder White has showed," s[illegible] Arvilly, "by his example just what t[illegible] Church of Christ could do if it want[illegible] to, to save men from the evil of this pr[illegible]ent time and git 'em headed towards t[illegible] Celestial City."

"Oh!" sez Elder Wessel, "I would [illegible]more use the church dedicated to t[illegible] Most High in the way you speak of th[illegible] I would use the communion cup to pa[illegible] water in."

"If a man wuz dyin' of thirst, and th[illegible] cup could be used to save him, don't y[illegible] spoze the Lord would want it used f[illegible] that, Elder Wessel?" sez Arvilly.

"Oh, no! oh, no!" sez he: "give n[illegible] that which is holy unto dogs; cast n[illegible] your pearls before swine."

"That is jest what I have been preac[illegible]in' to you," sez Arvilly. "Give not th[illegible] which is holy, the best nater, and goo[illegible]ness of boys and men to the dogs, t[illegible] brutes that lay in wait for 'em in whisk[illegible] laws. The God in man is murdere[illegible] every 'lection day by professors of r[illegible]ligion and ministers."

"IN MY ROOM, PACKIN'"

"Why—whyee," sez Elder Wessel, sinkin' back in his chair.

"Yes," sez the dantless Arvilly, "I mean jest what I say: them that refuse to vote and help in the matter are jest as guilty as license voters; they are consentin' to the crucifixion of Christ in man. And the poor drunkards are not the only nes they help nail to the cross. The innocent life and happiness of wimmen and children these wicked laws litt up on the cross of agony, and their heart's blood cries up to heaven for judgment on them that might have helped 'em and would not. The Church of Christ is responsible for this crime," sez Arvilly, "for there is not an evil on earth that could stand before the combined strength of a united church."

Sez Elder Wessel, gittin' back considerable dignity (her hash talk madded him awfully), sez he, "I simply see things in another light from what you do."

"He that is not for me is against me," sez Arvilly.

Sez the Elder in a dogmatic axent, real doggy it wuz, "I say again, the saloon is the Poor Man's Club."

And I sez dreamily, "Talkin' of a club as a club, a club in the hands of a drunkin man, strikin' at and destroyin' all the safety and happiness of a home, yes," sez I, "it is such a club."

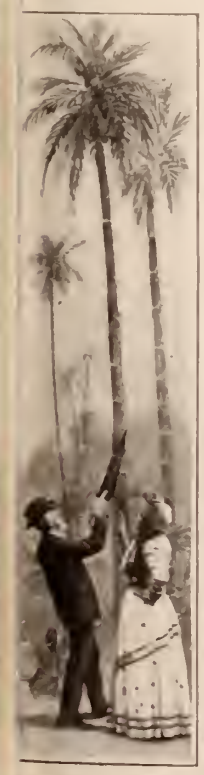
"Yes," sez Arvilly, "if poundin' his wife to jelly, and his children to deformity and death is a Poor Man's Club, the saloon is one."

Sez he agin, "Rich men have their clubs to which they may go, and drink all they choose—carouse, do as they please, and why not poor men, too?" he added.

And I sez, "Grantin' that rich men do drink and carouse at their clubs, as I don't know whether they do or not, two wrongs never made one right, and the liquor couldn't hurt 'em so much, for they can buy it pure, and the poor man's drink is pizen by adulteration, makin' a more dangerous drunk, ruinin' their health and makin' 'em pilin' for fights and bloodshed. The rich man can stay all night at his club, or if he goes home, the decorous butler or vally can send to him and protect his family if need be, he won't stagger in at midnight to a comfortless room, where his wife and little ones are herded in cold and starvation and are alone and at his mercy, and the rich man's carouse at his club don't keep his wife and children hungry for a week."

Bein' driv out of that position Elder Wessel tried a new tact: "The poor man has just as much right to the social enjoyment they get out of their saloon as you have, madam, to your afternoon teas and church socials."

"What hinders the poor man from 'tendin' socials?" sez Arvilly, spiritedly. "They are always bein' teased to, and anyway I never knew tea to make anybody crazy drunk."



"NEVER WILL I TACKLE IT"

"The poor man," sez Elder Wessel in his most dictorial way, all of Arvilly's talk havin' slipped offen him like rain water offen a brass horn, "the poor man, after he has worked hard all day, and has nothing to go home to but a room full of cryin' children, discomfort, squalor and a complaining wife, is justified in my opinion to go to the only bright happy place he knows of, the saloon."

But I sez, bein' such a case for justice, "How is it with the wife who has worked hard all day in the home of discomfort and squalor, her work being rendered ten times harder and more nerve destroying than her husband's by the care of the cryin' children, how would it be for them who are equally responsible for the marriage and the children, to take holt together and make the children happier and the home less full of discomfort?"

Arvilly Gives a Clincher

"Yes," sez Arvilly, "is it goin' to make the home less full of discomfort to have him reel home at midnight and dash the hungry cryin' baby aginst the wall and put out its feeble life, and mebby kill the complainin' wife too?"

"Oh those are extreme cases and uncommon," sez Elder Wessel.

"Not uncommon at all," sez Arvilly. "If you read the daily papers you will see such things as this, the direct work of the saloon, are continually occurring, too common in fact to attract very much attention."

He couldn't deny this, for he knew that we read the papers jest the same as he did, and the fact that he couldn't deny it seemed to kinder tire him, and he sez, getting up:

"I guess I will go and smoke a cigar." And he went. And I went up to my room too to pack my satchel bag, for we expected to start the very next mornin' and to be gone about a week or ten days.

Well, the steamer took us to Hilo, and the panorama that swep' by us on that steamer can't never be reproduced by any camera or kodak; the sapphire blue water, the hills standing like mountains of beaten gold and velvety green verdure, and beyond the soft blue and purple mountain ranges, agin deep clefts and cliffs of richest colored rocks with feathery white waterfalls floating down on 'em like a veil, anon pleasant landscapes, sugar cane plantations, picturesque houses, windmills, orchards, dancing brooks and broad green fields. No dissolvin' view wuz ever so entrancin', but like all others it had to dissolve.

"WE REACHED HILO THE SECOND DAY"

Ashore at Hilo

We reached Hilo the second day and we all went to a comfortable tarven, and the next mornin' bright and early we sot off on the stage for the volcano over, I state, and state it fearlessly, the most beautiful road that wuz ever built towards any volcano or anything else. Why, I've thought that the road between Jonesville and Loontown wuz beautiful and easy travelin'. Old Hagadone is path-master and vain of the road, and calls the men out twice a year to pay poll taxes and such, by workin' it. Sugar maples, elder bushes, and shuemakes and wild grapes and ivy run along the side of the stun wall, makin' it. I always had thought, onapproachable in beauty. But good land! if old Hagadone had seen that road he would have turned as green as grass with envy.

Imagine a wide road, smooth as glass, cut right out of a glowing tropical forest with a almost onimagined splendor, that I spoze wuz meant to be onseen by mortal eyes, risin' up on each side on't. Why, I've been as proud as a peacock of my little hibiscus growin' in grandma Allen's old teapot, and when that blowed out one little blow I called the neighbors in to witness the gorgeous sight. Imagine a hibiscus tree, as big as one of our biggest maples, fairly burnin' all over with the gorgeous blossoms, and banannas with their great glossy leaves, and lantannas. Wuzn't I proud of my lantanna growin' in Ma Smith's blue sugar bowl? I thought that it wuz a lovely sight when it had three blows on it at one time. But imagine milds and milds of 'em risin' up thirty feet on each side of the road, and little spindlin' palms, that we envy if growin' two feet high, growin' here to a hundred feet or more, and begonias and geraniums growin' up into tall trees and of every color, tuberoses and magnolias loadin' the air with fragrance, the glossy green of the ohia tree with the iaia vine climbing and racing over it all, mingled in with tamarind and oranges and bamboo, and oleanders with their delicious pink and white blossoms. Sez I: "Do you remember my little oleander growin' in a sap bucket, Josiah? Did you ever think of seein' em growin' fifty feet high? What a priceless treasure one would be in Jonesville."

"WHYEE!" SAID ELDER WESSEL, SINKIN' BACK

Josiah Demurs

And he whispered back real voyalent: "Don't think, Samantha, of gittin' me to lug one of them fifty foot trees all the way hum. I've broke my back for years luggin' round your old oleander in a tub, but never will I tackle one of them trees," and he looked up defiantly into the glossy boughs overhead.

"I hain't asked you to, Josiah, but," sez I dreamily: "I would love to git some slips of them fuchia and begonia trees, and that jasmine," sez I, pintin' up to the emerald waves of foliage enriched by them I have named, and as many other glowin' with perfume and beauty as there are stars in the heavens, or so it seemed to me. Sez I: "What a show I could make in Jonesville with 'em." Sez I: "What would Miss Bobbett and Sister Henzy say if they could see 'em?" And I pinted up at a gigantick trumpet creeper and convolvuli, festooned along the boughs of a giant geranium and hanging down its banner of bloom.

"They'd say, let well enough alone. I tell you I can't break up my trip diggin' dirt and tendin' to a lot of house-plants from Dan to Beersheba."

"We're not goin' to Dan," sez I, "and if we wuz a man might meet Dan doin' worse than pleasin' his pardner. Look at that jasmine," sez I. "Is that much like that little slip of Sister Bobbett's growin' in a tea-cup? And see! oh do see, Josiah, them night bloomin' ceriuses! Oh, take it on a moonlight night, the walls of fragrant green on either side, and them lovely blows, hundreds and thousands of 'em shinin' out like stars of whiteness, full of the odor of Paradise. Oh what a sight, Josiah Allen, for us to see!"

And he sez, "Don't git any idee, Samantha, of you and me comin' way back here by moonlight, for we can't do it. The road is thirty milds long and if we tried it we shouldn't git here till they had done blowin'."

A Stern Rebuke

"I hain't no idee of tryin' it Josiah, I wuz only revelin' in the idee of what the glory of the sight must be."

"Well," sez he, "I am revelin' in the idee of havin' a good meat dinner if we ever git to Hilo." And he added with a sarcastick smile, "Don't that make you think of poker? High, low—all it wants is Jack and the Game."

I gin him a stern look and sez, "Some knowledge is demeanin' to a pertessor." And he acted puggicky and didn't say another word for a mild or so. But I sot calm and looked away into the entrancin' seen. And all the time we wuz rollin' on towards the volcano.

Robert and Dorothy seemed to be enjoying the seen as much as I did, and Arvilly wuz tryin' to canvass the Scotchman. The Englishman had already bought the Twin Crimes, and so she wuz as happy as she ever would be, I spozed.

Journeying with Samantha

CENTRALIA, IA.

Dear Editor:—We hail with delight the trip with Aunt Samantha. As my time is limited for reading, I thought I could not read anything but the most solid or instructive. Being shut in this winter (not being able to go out but very little) Miss Holley's writings have been a very pleasing diversion. With all her fun-making, there is an under-current of meaning that is immense. God bless the dear writer with health and strength to write many more such delightful stories.

... Under the Evening Lamp ...

By Margaret E. Sangster

Tasks of Oriental Women

OUR greatest drudgery, our least luxurious life in Occidental lands is easy and restful as compared with the lives led by women in the far East. As we know comfort, they have not the faintest notion of it, nor have they any of the labor-saving appliances which are found in our simplest homes. In India, now, as for centuries, the women beat out the grain from the stalk with a heavy mallet made of teak wood and bound with iron, while other women sitting on the earthen floor inside the hut, or in the compound by the door, grind the meal in a small hand-mill, as women in the East have done for ages. One understands the many allusions in Scripture to this custom, when one thinks of the patient brown-faced Hindu women, still engaged, as Indian women were in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah, and in New Testament days, in the daily grinding of their corn. The primitive apparatus, the uncomplaining service, the fortitude exhibited, are all very touching to us, but far more so is the thought of the famine in India to-day, with the great suffering it entails. Women and children dying by scores and hundreds from bitter wasting hunger; parents expiring from exhaustion and leaving their orphaned little ones; people, with our own needs, our own wants, our own capacity for anguish, and more than our capacity for endurance, since ages of hardship have made them patient, bowed under the hard, cold hand of famine. Surely most of us will hear the appeal this suffering makes, and will endeavor out of our own abundance to assist starving India, with her millions in extremity. In these days the Christian missionary is the native's kindest and truest friend, and Christ alone can give the people assurance of relief and the promise of peace and safety in the midst of woe.

Our Darlings

The roguish little fellow whose eyes are peeping out and whose mind is wandering from his evening prayer somehow wins our hearts, so that we want to kiss his little face and coax him to be as reverent as the others. Mischief is no great matter in a laddie of his age, and we really prefer it to stupidity.

How happy is that period when the evening shadows gather, and we shut our eyes and sleep without a single care, having first folded our hands and said the nightly prayer. Our children, in absolute faith, commit themselves to the divine guidance, and therein we may well imitate them, since we are all children of our Father. The golden heads and the dark heads, the heads close-cropped and the heads adorned with tresses and ringlets are alike beautiful, and as we look at our darlings wherever they kneel, we pray from the depths of our souls that evermore God may bless them.

Teachers and Children

Teachers are not to be held responsible for defects in the educational system under which they teach. If the prevalent theory of the city or town magnifies the routine of the class and diminishes the welfare of the individual child, the system is to blame, not the teacher. Taken all in all, our common school teachers constitute a body of hard-working, faithful, intelligent and devoted people, what Col. Higginson has aptly called "a finer force in our civilization." Their quiet, obscure and often meagerly paid work goes on day in and day out. They are moulding the next generation. Take an East Side New York school, and see the sharp, wizened faces of little foreign-born children, or children of foreign parents, the latter not yet speaking English. As clay in the hands of the potter are these small boys and girls, and the progress they make under the steady, sweet, unremitting and trusty missionary influence of their teachers—young women, for the most part is simply marvelous. Each of our public schools—whatever else it may be—is a manufactory of American citizens and it turns out, all things considered, a very good article.

Memory

Memory is a pack-horse bound to carry whatever is properly committed to him, provided the load is safely adjusted. We deplore our poor memories and plume ourselves upon our good ones, as if the poor memory or the good one were given us by our Heavenly Father, and as if we could not help ourselves in the matter. The fact is that we are the makers of our own memories. Attention to what one sees or hears, and the habit of fixing details on our minds, will enable any of us to remember, not in a slip-shod and inconsequent fashion, but accurately, whatever is really worth our while. We should not burden memory with a thousand foolish trivialities, which are of no real value. Many things are much better forgotten, among them the rude letter somebody sent you, the unkind story you heard, and the anecdote which had a sting. A short memory for other people's faults and foibles, a long memory for every little kindness shown, are good points in character. And, toward our God, should we not reverently cultivate a good memory? "I will remember," says the psalmist, "the years of the right hand of the Most High." Over and over again, through all their wanderings, the people of God, in the old days, were enjoined to tell again and again of his goodness, recounting the way by which he had led them out of Egypt through the wilderness and into the promised land. We should be far more grateful if we did more remembering. "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so!"

A WEARY TASK. GRINDING AND POUNDING CORN

Aunt Prudence Payson's Catch-all

—STEPMOTHER. My whole heart went out to you in love and admiration when I read your letter. Yours is the true secret of all success, dear friend—constant prayer and unselfish love. God bless you and make many others like you.

—SCHOOL MARM. Do you realize that you are one of the vanguard of civilization in your little pioneer school house, so many miles from the railroad? Don't think of your work as small. It is very important, and you are a woman in the right place.

—J. MCP. Aunt Prudence cannot see that there is any reason for your anxiety. The young lady is not, as you state the matter, engaged to any one, and there is no harm in her receiving your friendly visits, even if she is corresponding with another man. You need not call so often as to give rise to remarks from outsiders.

—MOTHER OF BOYS. You are right to be very careful about your boys' reading. If you have a Sunday School or town library, let them draw books from that, otherwise consult your minister. The Henty books are very popular among boys, and are excellent both as history and romance. There are a great many of them and, in one edition, they are not dear. Several families might combine in purchasing them. Write to the nearest Y. M. C. A. secretary, too, and see if you cannot be put on the line of some traveling library. Boys are helped or hindered by their reading, and you should not care how much you have to economize if you can get good books for them.

—MRS. M. O. Five or six weeks is a very short time for all you plan to do next summer. Your passage should be engaged now. Many people who wish to economize travel very comfortably as second-cabin passengers. Or you could take one of the slower steamers and save money. Carry as little clothing as possible, but be provided with a heavy wrap. For fuller information write to any of the tourist companies which arrange excursions. You will find their advertisements in the daily papers. A knowledge of French is not necessary, as English is spoken everywhere on the continent. In your case I advise your joining a party, as you and your husband are inexperienced in European travel. If you are going only for the Exposition you need no especial preliminary course of reading. At such a time expenses will be greater than they would in an ordinary summer, on account of the great exodus of American travelers.

THE LITTLE BOY WE MISS

(To a bereaved mother)

We miss our darling; weeks ago
It seems since he ran in and out,
Played with the rest, romped in the snow,
Left books and toys and things about.

His merry eyes, his winsome ways,
A mother's laddie, fine and sweet;
Oh, these are strangely silent days
Unbroken by those eager feet.

We miss him in the morning when
His little comrades rush along;
And in the early gloaming, then
We hunger for his shout and song.

The heartache goes so very deep.
His little unused bed is white;
That other where he lies asleep
Is low beneath the sod to-night.

And much we marvel, grieving, why
Should God stop to this home of ours;
When in his fields beyond the sky,
He has so many, many flowers.

Why take our little bud of bloom,
When he could see we had but one;
Why leave forlorn our little room,
When he had thousands, star and sun!

We cannot tell, but God knows best,
On this we lay the throbbing head;
A rock, a pillow for our rest,
And resting, we are comforted.

In God's own garden, angel-kept,
We yet shall find our darling boy.
Where they awake, with Christ who slept,
Where life is love and heaven is joy.

About Showing Our Love
For the Little Ones

WHEN I was a child I read story about a boy who ha two aunts with whom, bein an orphan, he lived for si months. At the end of a specified pe riod, by the terms of his father's will, h was obliged to choose which aunt shoul be his guardian, and with which h should permanently reside. Aunt Jan was much given to indulgence, to pettin and caressing; Aunt Mary was not de monstrative and held a firm though ver just rein in her management of the litt lad. It was much to his credit that h elected to remain with Aunt Mary, wh was at bottom very unselfish, rather tha with Aunt Jane, who wanted his affec tion, but was averse to taking any re trouble on his account.

Children are very clear-sighted littl beings and observe and discriminate fa more closely and judiciously than adul often suppose. They are not impose upon by the lazy love which spends i self in calling pet names and bestowin sweets in season and out of season. Th love, less fluent in words, which care for their comfort, reproves their fault and sets right their mistakes, is the lov they prize most. Tired mothers, bus with drying wet mittens and stocking which have been in the snow, with patch ing small knees and seating small trous ers, with hearing lessons, and correctin slips of syntax, and settling nursery qua rels, may not stop a dozen times a day t snatch up the bairns and kiss and hu them, but the bairns do not doubt th dear mother love.

Mother's Room

The place in the house to whic everybody hastes is mother's room Here the big boys come when thei work for the day is over, and the daugh ters bring their perplexities, and th little ones cluster. Mother cannot kee them out, for where she is, there home is Have you not often noticed the way th children follow the mother through th house, going into the kitchen to help he make the pies, and into the pantry where she is measuring sugar and spice and into the bedrooms where she is mak ing the beds, under her very feet, clingin to her skirts, utterly contented if onl where she is. Her room, when she get done with her sewing, is to them a ver eden, and there they play with their dolls their blocks, their maps, their trains o cars, feeling somehow as if nothing coul mar their delight because they wer under mother's eye, and nestling beneath her tender wing.

... India in Dire Straits ...

The Famine Area Now Doubled and the Missionaries in Sore Need of Help

BY REV. J. E. ABBOTT, OF BOMBAY

DESTITUTE NATIVES OF INDIA CUTTING GRASS TO SELL FOR FOOD

THREE months have passed since the Government of India officially announced the existence of famine and the apprehension that a large area would be affected. During that time the fears then expressed have been more than realized. The area the famine at the beginning of Novemr contained thirty million people; the ant spectre has now its grip on an area ntaining fifty-two million people. The mber on relief works has sprung duri the same period from 400,000 to 00,000. This large accession comes m people who must have died if such ief had not been extended to them.

We are very thankful that the Governnt has done so much, but there is anher class for whom we are deeply conned, who have no share in this relief. is class is made up of children, delice women and men, who for a variety of sons cannot go to the relief works. ese number tens of thousands, and they now dying by hundreds. Their emaciad forms the missionary sees around doors pitifully pleading for just one al.

For the children, especially, our hearts he. The Hindoo mother is in no way hind American mothers in her affecn for her offspring. She will deny lself, as they would, that her babes ght eat; but what is she to do when e has absolutely nothing for herself nor them? During the famine of 1897 l sy women so weak for lack of food that ey could not stand and the children ound them were mere skeletons covd with skin. A mother so situated is lpless. If she keeps them with her ey will die. Some Mohammedan will ve her a rupee (thirty-three cents) for daughter. She shudders as she thinks the girl's fate, but the child will, at y rate, be fed and the price of her will ovide a meal for the others. What nder that, with a breaking heart, the rgain is made and the child goes away to her horrible captivity. Sometimes e mother will abandon the child by the adside, hoping that some charitable pern may take pity on it, or if not, that death y speedily end its suffering. It is for ese mothers and children that we plead, r the aged and for the sick, and for all o cannot go to the relief camps, or who uld not do the work that would be reired of them there. A dollar in the nds of a missionary would enable him give one meal to twenty of them, or able him to keep one person alive for ee weeks. Think of it! The quesn of life or death for some poor creae depending on whether some Ameri- Christian gives a dollar, or spends it some luxury for himself!

t is easy to see from the letters of the missionaries and the incident related in the Indian papers how severe is the suffering and how much good the missionaries might do with a little money. Rev. W. Mulligan, of Pauch Mahal, writes: "Already our home has received twenty little waifs and this morning the police asked us if we could not take a dozen more. I would have liked to accept them, but we have now as many as we can feed. The other day a Bhil woman was trying to sell her niece. The best offer she could get was five quarts of grain. She refused it and brought the girl to us." Mrs. Fuller, of the Alliance Mission, reports that she has already taken charge of sixty orphan children. Rev. E. Fairbank, of Wadale, writes: "Our helpers are continually beset by people begging for a mouthful of grain. People come to us by the score pitifully entreating us to help them. One poor fellow was so weak that in bending forward to make the customary salaam, he could not recover himself and fell on his face and was unable to rise." Rev. J. B. Bawa, of Roha, reports the increase around him of the number of starving people, especially of helpless women. A very small sum would enable him to relieve in various ways the severe suffering in his district.

It is grievous to witness the struggle that is being made even by people who a short time ago were in comfortable circumstances. It is no uncommon thing to see a man and his wife working hard with any implement they can get, cutting grass, which after a long day's labor they sell for the price of one meagre meal.

The situation threatens to be worse than in the famine of 1897 and the need must inevitably be greater, because the help that then came so liberally from England, will not be afforded now that she is absorbed in the South African conflict. The eyes of the American missionaries are turned to their own land and their hope is that the Christian people who have sent them to preach Christ to the heathen, will supply them with the means by which they can show how kind and compassionate the heart becomes in which he lives and reigns.

RESERVE FORCE

Obtained Through the Use of Properly Selected Food

"I want to tell you about Grape-Nuts, and my experience with them.

"I had for a year or two, felt a general debility creeping on me, and also suffered from flatuency, piles, etc., which I began to think was due to advancing age, now being 65 years old, when in the providence of God, as I believe, the Grape-Nuts Food was brought to my notice, and tried as an experiment.

"I used it with milk, as mush. In a week I found a decided improvement in myself, and have kept improving ever since, now about three months, and am being congratulated on the bright change in my appearance by all acquaintances. Not only so, but I feel I have the reserve force so that I do not feel wearied at night, although I have worked continuously this last three months, from 7:30 A. M. until 9 P. M. Need I say that I recommend your Grape-Nuts to my friends and acquaintances, and that all of my family use the food, and that we use it at every meal whatever else is omitted? I write this being desirous of giving vent to the grateful feeling I entertain for the benefits received from the use of your incomparable food. Although a total stranger to you, I beg to subscribe myself sincerely your friend and well-wisher, John C. Fletcher, New Rochelle, N. Y."

The particular element which produces the feeling of strength is the delicate particles of phosphate of potash, not the phosphate of the drug store, but that which is prepared by nature and furnished in the grains. This delicate element, not observed by the taste, is used by nature in connection with the albumen of food, to repair and rebuild the gray matter in the nerve centres throughout the body and in the brain and solar plexus, so that one thus nourished and rebuilt is very sure to feel the effects of this rebuilding within a week or ten days, and this feeling grows and becomes fixed as one becomes a steady, every-day user of Grape-Nuts. The food is made by the famous pure food manufacturers at Battle Creek, Mich., the Postum Cereal Co., Ltd.

. . . A Real . . . "New Testament Church"

Evangelist Wharton Describes One Whose Members Live Like a Band of Early Christians

TRAVELING over the country, I come in contact with churches and people of every description. For many years, I have taken the ground that a Christian people should refrain from all vain, worldly amusements, and I have been anxious to find the church which carried this principle into practice, in order that I might know the measure of its success and its influence upon a community. I have at last found such a church at Owensboro, Ky., where I have been conducting evangelistic services. The pastor is Rev. Fred. Hale, D.D., himself a successful evangelist. He is a graduate of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary, and one of the leading men of the South to-day.

REV. H. M. WHARTON

Owensboro, Ky., is a thriving little town of some eighteen thousand population, and is situated on the Ohio river a hundred miles south of Louisville. On August 9, 1896—nearly three and a half years ago—four hundred and ninety-one Baptists, led by their chosen pastor, Dr. Hale, organized a real New Testament, spiritual, soul-winning, anti-worldly church. It entered the Daviess County Baptist Association as the "Owensboro Third Baptist Church." Resolutions were unanimously adopted to the effect that no person should be received into, nor retained in fellowship, who engaged in dancing, card-playing, drinking liquor as a beverage, renting property to liquor dealers, or in any way investing money in or dealing in the liquor business. They resolved also to enforce scriptural discipline in the case of rich and prominent members, as well as poor and obscure ones. Another resolution was to the effect that there should be no suppers, excursions, fairs, lectures, entertainments, etc., as a means of raising money for the support of the church and the carrying on of its work; and the New Testament financial system of proportionate giving was adopted, one-tenth of the net income being the proportion selected by the church and requested of its members to be set apart for the Lord's work.

It was decided not to have an institutional church, with secular attachments, nor a social club to gather the elite only, nor a musical organization to furnish classic music; but to effect a religious organization, whose purpose it should be to win souls to Christ, a people's church, working for all classes of sinners. It was to be a Baptist church, loyal and faithful to the teachings of Christ as to the doctrines, government and ordinances of a New Testament church: and on the other hand, with a broad, liberal, charitable and fraternal Christian spirit, recognize and appreciate the relationship existing between all Evangelical Christians, composing the Church Universal, and to co-operate in union work with other denominations as far as possible without compromising their convictions of duty to Christ along doctrinal lines.

Comparatively poor, this little band commenced housekeeping as a church family in the county court-house. Ridiculed as "cranks and fanatics" and antagonized and denounced as disturbers of the religious peace of the community, they were persecuted by press and people to a degree seldom witnessed. Nonresisting, they kept to their work as a pioneer, anti-liquor, anti-dancing, anti-card-playing church. It was thought wise to select the best available building lot in the city, though a costly one; consequently their place of worship is within a stone's throw of the centre of the city's population. Desiring to make room for the masses, it was decided to erect a large auditorium, and a fine brick tabernacle was projected and is now complete, at a cost of $35,000. It has a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred. The church is now no longer an experiment, but stands as one of the strongest and most influential of the twelve Protestant churches in Owensboro. Carrying out the principle with which it started, it has reached all classes of people, having received 764 members into its fellowship, and having a resident membership now of more than 1,000. Its total cash contributions for the three and a half years amount to above $40,000. In addition to contributing to all the missionary and educational work fostered by the denomination, it supports a foreign missionary, Miss Julia K. McKenzie, in Chinkiang, China. Even those who oppose its views of Christian living admire and praise it, and the world stands off and says "that church is straight goods." H. M. WHARTON.

A Practical Vicar

He Paints His Own Church when His Parishioners Cannot Afford It

THE Rev. G. M. MacDonald, vicar of the historic old Episcopal church of St. John the Baptist at Spalding, England, has given his brethren of the cloth an impressive lesson in practical Christianity. For a long time the walls of his church had been sadly in need of a new coat of paint, but the parish was so poor that no funds were available for the work. But the vicar proved equal to the emergency, donned a painter's blouse and painted the church and school himself.

Vicar MacDonald is not the only clergyman who has performed manual labor. The late Rev. C. H. Wood, long curate of St. George's Preston, was an expert carpenter, whose skill was always at the disposal of his poor parishioners. Household furniture of their pastor's design graced their cottages, and even coffins were sometimes made by the same hand. The Rev. C. Sellwood Goodwin, of St. Aidan, Middlesborough, having no building in which to hold services, himself dug the foundation, and then with a party of eighty volunteer helpers, who labored in their spare hours, he set about the work with such zeal that within a few months the building, seating between 600 and 700 people, was formally opened by the Archbishop of York. Another vicar, who in his younger days, for exercise, had often worked at the village forge, took the place of the smith, while the latter was sick, and worked steadily and skilfully till the smith returned to his forge. A Sussex rector is a skilled bookbinder.

FRIED ONIONS

Indirectly Caused the Death of the World's Greatest General

It is a matter of history that Napoleon was a gurmand, an inordinate lover of the good things of the table, and history further records that his favorite dish was fried onions; his death from cancer of stomach, it is claimed also was probably caused from his excessive indulgence of this fondness for the odorous vegetable.

The onion is undoubtedly a wholesome article of food, in fact has many medicinal qualities of value, but it would be difficult to find a more indigestible article than fried onions, and to many people they are simply poison, but the onion does not stand alone in this respect. Any article of food that is not thoughly digested becomes a source of disease and discomfort, whether it be fried onions or beef steak.

The reason why any wholesome food is not promptly digested is because the stomach lacks some important element of digestion; some stomachs lack peptone, others are deficient in gastric juice, still others lack Hydrochloric acid.

The one thing necessary to do in any case of poor digestion is to supply those elements of digestion which the stomach lacks, and nothing does this so thoroughly and safely as Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

F. Richardson, in writing a thesis on treatment of dyspepsia and indigestion, closes his remarks by saying, "for those suffering from acid dyspepsia, shown by sour watery risings, or for flatulent dyspepsia shown by gas on stomach, causing heart trouble and difficult breathing, as well as for all other forms of stomach trouble, the safest treatment is to take one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets after each meal. I advise them because they contain no harmful drugs, but are composed of valuable digestives, which act promptly upon the food eaten. I never knew a case of indigestion or even chronic dyspepsia which Stuart's Tablets would not reach."

Cheap cathartic medicines claiming to cure dyspepsia and indigestion can have no effect whatever in actively digesting the food and to call any cathartic medicine a cure for indigestion is a misnomer.

Every druggist in the United States and Canada sells Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, and they are not only the safest and most successful but the most scientific of any treatment for indigestion and stomach troubles.

How God Pays Men

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for March 4. Matt. 20:1-16

WHAT does a man gain by being a Christian? Judging by the conditions of this world we must answer, Very little. He abstains from many pleasures which are really enjoyable; he gives up many delights that would gratify his nature; and the question that Emerson argued in his essay on "Compensation," is sure to be asked by others, if not by the man himself. The question is by no means new. The prophet Malachi represents the people of his day as saying: "What profit is it that we have kept his ordinance?" and Job had made acquaintance with the same kind of people (Job 21:15). Peter asked the question, too. "Behold, we have forsaken all and followed thee: what shall we have therefore?" The spirit still survives. A middle-aged lady said to her pastor only a few days ago: "I have kept aloof from all kinds of dissipation and all kinds of worldliness; but I do not see that I have gained anything by it." Christ's answer to all such talk is the Parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard. People who want reward, who expect pay for being good, will surely be disappointed in Christianity.

It is true that Christianity has rewards to give. True, too, that the rewards astonish the recipients by their magnificence, but they do not go to the people who work for them. Christ has an eye for the motive in all work, and he has a poor opinion of those who have the bargaining spirit. When he bestows a reward he gives it to those who were not expecting it. "Lord when saw we thee hungry and fed thee?" the men ask of him in the judgment and they have to be told of the conduct which Christ is rewarding. They never expected a reward for the things they did. The story is told of a millionaire who decided to take a child from an orphan asylum and bring him up as his heir. He went to the asylum and watched the children in their play. He noticed a boy caring for a little lame companion, helping him in difficulty and protecting him from the rough conduct of others. That was the boy he chose. Believing that he had a kind and noble nature. But suppose that boy knew the business that had brought the millionaire there and that he cared for the lame child for the purpose of ingratiating himself with the millionaire. All the beauty of his conduct would be destroyed. Its value consisted in its being the spontaneous outgrowth of his disposition. So in later life. The young man will make no success of his occupation if he is chiefly concerned about his wages. The author or the artist will not succeed, if his thoughts are all the time on the money he will get for his book or his picture. He must take a delight in his work, otherwise his work will be sordid, slavish and perfunctory.

In the parable Christ represents the owner of the vineyard disregarding ordinary rules of business. The first laborers make their bargain and he keeps faith with them. They demand a certain rate of pay and they receive it. "They have their reward." The relation between the two sides is simply that of employer and employees. But the later laborers show a confidence in the householder which brought them nearer together. "Whatsoever is right that shall ye receive" satisfied them. They trusted him and went to work. Christ always placed a high value on this faith or confidence. Those who believed he could and would help them got the blessing. The bargain-maker, the man who looked for reward and made stipulations he disliked. The elder brother in the parable of the Prodigal Son showed this character in reproaching his father. The essence of Christ's religion consists in being. It is in character. The man who has his spirit does right because it is right, does good because he loves to do good, lives a holy life because he loves holiness, follows Christ because he loves him, not because of the loaves and fishes. That is the man who in the end will be surprised like the eleventh hour laborers by the munificence of the reward.

BRONCHIAL CONSUMPTION

From Dr. Hunter's Lectures on the Progress of Medical Science in the Treatment of Lung Diseases

Of the many forms of Bronchitis, the one most alarming of all is that in which the symptoms closely resemble those of consumption, and hence called consumptive bronchitis, or bronchial consumption. You must not, however, understand from its name that it is really tuberculous in character, or produced by the bacilli which cause true consumption.

In all lung cases, I require a portion of the expectorated matter coughed up by the patient to be brought to me, or sent in a small bottle by express, before giving a definite opinion of the disease. If, on examination, I find the tubercle bacilli present, the case is consumption; and if no bacilli—Bronchitis. A large percentage of those who die of a lung disease, supposed to be consumption, are really deaths by chronic bronchitis resembling consumption.

A remarkable instance in verification of this recently occurred. A lady was brought to me in what appeared the last stage of consumption. Her physicians had told her husband that she could not live a week. She had a bad cough, puriform expectorations, night sweats, and was wasted almost to skin and bone. Judging by her symptoms and appearance, it was impossible not to fear that she had come too late. On sounding her chest, however, I was surprised to find no solidification by tubercles, and on examining of her sputum a total absence of the bacilli. The history, too, of her sickness revealed that it had followed an attack of whooping cough and grippe. So, although her pulse was 120 a minute, and so feeble as to be hardly perceptible, and the wasting of her body so extreme that she could not stand without support, I did not hesitate to pronounce the disease bronchial, and give it as my opinion that, if we could sustain her strength long enough for remedies to act, she would be saved. She was immediately placed under medicated air treatment, with tonics to impart appetite and digestives to help the enfeebled stomach to transform nourishments into chyle and blood. Within a week she showed signs of amendment. Her progress was necessarily slow, as the healing powers of the body were nearly exhausted before the first inhalation was given, but she gradually acquired more and more strength, and within six weeks was able to take short walks in the open air. She recovered perfectly in about six months, and is alive and well to-day.

This case shows the importance of a correct diagnosis and proper adaptation of the treatment of the conditions to be remedied. Had the true nature of her disease not been discovered just when it was, she would have lost her life through wrong treatment, and been recorded as another death by consumption.

Every form of bronchitis is curable by local antiseptic and healing remedies applied directly to the lungs by medicated air inhalation, but none of them by stomach treatment. The stomach is not the part affected. The air tubes and cells of the lungs are the seat of every bronchial disease, and unless remedies capable of changing their bad secretions and healing the inflamed tubes are applied to them, cure is impossible. To treat bronchial and other lung diseases through the stomach and hold out a hope of cure by that treatment is malpractice, and ought to be punished as a crime against the sick.

In order to obtain Dr. Hunter's book, "The Lungs and Their Diseases," free, address Dr. Robert Hunter Association, 117 W. 45th street, New York.

"The Christian Herald" in India

MANY of our readers will remember Dr. Alice B. Condict, the American medical missionary, whose excellent contributions describing life in the upper circles of society in India appeared in this journal. Dr. Condict has returned and established herself in Bombay, from which city she now sends this interesting letter:

BOMBAY, Dec. 9, 1899.

DEAR "CHRISTIAN HERALD":—I must tell you how much good the copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is doing which you are sending me. First, I use it in my Rest Home for missionaries here, and dear friends, from every part of India enjoy reading it. They especially like the superb pictures. All agree that they never saw such excellent pictures in a religious paper. Then my copy is sent to a place in the interior—Karjat, on the Great Indian and Peninsular railroad—where some Free Church of Scotland missionaries have a free reading-room, and there it is read and re-read over and over. Those numbers you had on the Transvaal were very especially appreciated. I don't suppose any English religious newspaper has given such exhaustive and attractive articles as those on the South African war.

Our Missionary Rest Home has now been open two months, and it is my great joy to write you that God has used us in this place most wonderfully. Young and old declare it is a real Home. The very fact of bringing these dear saints together is a mutual benefit. Many, with malaria lurking in their system, have come to get a change and have in every instance been able, with my little medicine case, to shake off the disease. We are in a building that is on a point of land that runs away out seaward, so the air is very pure and perfectly free from malaria. We are praying for a free bed, to be able at times to entertain those who cannot afford to come unless it is free.

May you remember us in this great need, to be able to resuscitate these faithful brothers and sisters, relatives of ours in the Lord. Yours for the Master's service, ALICE B. CONDICT.

Made Him a Square Man

A few months ago a Franklin, N. Y., business man inadvertently gave a customer a ten-dollar gold piece for fifty cents change. The customer who received the gold piece observed to another party a few hours after that it was the funniest fifty-cent piece he had ever seen.

"Yes," replied the new arrival, "but I'll give you two quarters for it."

The fool and the knave closed the bargain; the fool walked off with the two silver quarters, and the knave with the yellow piece.

The loss of the ten-dollar gold piece worried the Franklin merchant because he could not account for its disappearance. During the recent revival in Franklin, conducted by Rev. H. W. Pope, superintendent of the Northfield Extension, the man with the ten-dollar gold piece was converted, and finally returned the gold piece to the merchant. Justice was thus rendered on all sides. The merchant got back his gold, the converted man got back the half-dollar he paid the rustic, and the latter by this time probably has exchanged his two silver quarters for something else.

The Army Chaplaincy

Our readers interested in the army chaplaincy and the spiritual welfare of our "Boys in Blue," may have read with regret the strictures written by the uninformed on the efficiency of the service, some of the criticism being based on Chaplain Orville J. Nave's request that his order to service in the Philippines be revoked. It develops that the cause of Chaplain Nave's course in this matter is organic heart disease, which utterly disqualifies him for action in the field, although he is one of the most efficient workers in the home service. During his past two years at Fort McPherson, he has admitted many applicants to church membership; secured 1,500 total abstinence pledges; preached two or three times every Sunday and held meetings almost every night; visited the sick in hospital and prison; distributed literature, wrote letters for those unable to write—in short, he has been performing in spite of his dangerous malady, all of the thousand-and-one offices which devolve upon every faithful chaplain, and which makes the institution of the army chaplain invaluable to the soldier and his family and friends.

Don't use

an imitation—especially imitations of Pearline. Many are dangerous. And dangerous washing powders can never be cheap—no matter how little you pay for them. Peddlers and untrustworthy grocers will tell you the stuff they offer is "Pearline," "same as," "as good as," "made in the same factory," etc. It's false. Pearline is the standard washing compound; never peddled; gives no prizes; simply stands on its merits as the best, safest, and most economical. 575

ALASKA WORKER

ined 44 lbs. by Leaving off Coffee and Taking Postum Food Coffee

Some people in Alaska have work to do. widow woman, Mrs. Adda Crossley, of Juau, says she has been doing the cooking for ght men through the winter, and during the mmer for fifteen more. She went to Alaska invalid, and had been in poor health four five years before going. It seems that her kness was caused and kept up by the use of ffee. When she finally discovered the real use, she abandoned coffee, and finding Post-n Cereal Coffee in the stores, took up its e.

She says: "I commenced using it once a day two months, then twice a day. I only ighed eighty pounds when I started, and uld hardly get up and down the stairway. ter leaving off coffee and beginning the use Postum, I took up the work for eight men. mproved steadily, and in December last ighed 124 pounds, which is more than I ve weighed for twenty years. My face is lnd and ruddy. Friends say if it was not r my gray hair I would pass for thirty ry easily. There is no doubt that the rds on the famous trademark, 'It makes l blood,' are true."

Sick headache is the cause of untold suffering to many women; of nelected families and unhappy homes. Pleasure is banished from the life that is subject to these attacks, and yet it is possible to be free forever from such trying ordeals. Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, by enriching the blood, toning up the nerves and strengthening the stomach, make sick headache impossible and restore nervous energy to the despondent sufferer.

Mrs. Fannie B. Stoffle, of Martinsville, Mo., says: "I used to have terrible sick headaches, which I had as far back as I can remember. In recent years they were getting worse. A few years ago, I took treatment of a specialist in Kansas City, but it only relieved me for a while. When I came here two years ago my health was miserable. My husband, who had great faith in Dr. Williams' Pink Pills for Pale People, insisted that I commence using them. After taking a few doses I could see an improvement and my headache spells were not so severe. I used four boxes, and since that time I have not had any of those attacks and I never felt so well in my life. —From the Republican, Bethany, Mo.

Women in Pastoral Work

A New College in the West to Train Them as Assistant Pastors and City Missionaries

A MOVEMENT has just been inaugurated in the West for the establishment of a college to be devoted exclusively to the training of women for pastoral and mission work. The movement owes its inception to the Christian church. A committee is considering plans and the question of a site, and the college will probably be located at Chicago. Women are to be trained to assist in pastoral and mission work, especially in the larger cities. The Committee will report on March 29th at a conference to be held in Indianapolis. This Committee consists of Rev. Dr. S. G. Tyrrell, of Chicago, Chairman; Rev. W. B. Taylor, Rev. Dr. H. F. Willett, Rev. Dr. George B. Darstadt, all of Chicago; Rev. Dr. J. W. Harden, President of Eureka College, Illinois; Rev. Dr. C. D. Philpot, of Central Church, Indianapolis; J. E. Pounds, National Superintendent of Christian Endeavor; Rev. C. M. Thurgood, of Pittsburg, and Rev. A. M. Harvout.

REV. A. M. HARVOUT

Dr. Harvout, pastor of the Central Christian church, of Cincinnati, is the father of the project. He holds that though women seldom have the oratorical ability to enable them to discharge the duties of the pulpit, they would make ideal assistants and render invaluable service in visiting and general mission work. "There are many kinds of work which are entirely within a woman's sphere that a man cannot well attend to, and for this reason alone, if for no other, the gentler sex should be trained for the work. I have the advantage of experience, having employed a woman assistant for some time in connection with my own work. She does all lines of pastoral work among rich and poor and her work is so successful that I conceived the idea of a 'Training School' for the education of women as pastoral helpers. Other city pastors have selected faithful women for the same work. The demand so exceeds the supply that a school has become a general demand among ministers."

FOUR GENERATIONS OF READERS OF "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

The faculty of the school will comprise the best talent available. Systematic instruction will be given in the Scriptures and in the work which devolves on the pastor of a congregation. Students will be expected to spend four afternoons a week in actual service among the poor, at the missions, etc., in order to enter on their work thoroughly fortified by actual experience.

Industrial Work in Cuba

A new orphanage movement has been started in Cuba, under the name of the "Thurston Memorial Home," in honor of the late Mrs. J. M. Thurston, of Omaha, who died in Cuba. Forty acres of land have been secured in Puerto Principe for an industrial home, and while buildings are being erected the work will be carried on in tents. Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Andrews, who have long experience in industrial work, will manage the enterprise, which is a purely undenominational and benevolent one. A full Board of Management and an Advisory Board, composed of persons well known in religious and benevolent affairs, have been chosen. Rev. Seneca Howland, Bible House, New York, will answer all inquiries that may be addressed to him concerning the work.

The East African Famine

LATE letters received from missionaries in East Africa show that there is no abatement of the famine conditions prevailing in parts of Mombasa province, and especially in the districts round about Voi and Kikuyu. In the latter section 50,000 people have already starved to death, while no less than 500,000 of the population of Ukamba have perished from the same cause.

In a letter from the Rev. F. W. Krieger, of the Christian Umty Evangelical and Industrial Mission at Nairobi, East Africa, to F. K. Hawley, superintendent of the Christian Unity Association at Hawleyville, Conn., the writer says:

"With gratitude I acknowledge the receipt of your cablegram. I thanked God and ordered four tons of rice, costing $350. This will be a beginning of better days to some poor, needy souls. I am almost afraid to hire a lot of people, because it is evident that this famine must hold sway for six more dreary months—three months before rains can be expected, and if they then come, it will take three months more before the people can realize anything from their fields; and besides, seed is all eaten up long ago. Consequently it is quite a responsibility to take people unless they can be maintained for the next half year. But God has ever stood with us.

"The distress is beyond description, and what is more pitiable, the people have ceased to beg. One meets a poor, tottering skeleton, whose sunken eyes give only an appealing look, and it passes on; and no surprise if the next day I find the remnants of what the hyenas have eaten during the night to be the remains of the poor starveling of the day before. While I write, the horrid hyenas are in the midst of their ghastly midnight carnival, not five hundred yards from the house. Some one has succumbed to hunger to-day, and that within rifle-shot of our door, and we did not even know it until I am told by the weird howls and uncanny laughter of one of the most revolting brutes.

"The natives will need seed in three months. If the good people at home could contribute something to that, I would order a large quantity of corn, which would be judiciously distributed just at the beginning of the planting season." F. W. KRIEGER.

Any inquiries concerning the work or contributions, if sent to Rev. W. P. Ray, Hawleyville, Conn., or Rev. Charles F. Hurlbut, 926 N. Broad street, Philadelphia, will receive prompt attention.

Four Generations

Mrs. M. J. Wilson, of Elwood, Neb., sends this picture, and the following letter concerning the oldest figure in it. Mrs. Ella Howard Wright, who is the mother, grandmother and great-grandmother of the other members of the group. She is now in her one-hundredth year:

Mother was born in Clinton, N. Y.; after living there and in Oswego county for seventy years, she came to Nebraska, when everything was new, and much of the land a virgin forest. A godly age, truly, at which to begin the life of a pioneer. She has helped to organize Sunday Schools, churches and Good Templar Lodges, and has always been ready to help in any good cause. She is quite smart and active. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has long been a welcome visitor to our home.

Half a Century for Christ

Egbert Rinehart's Long Career as a Sunday School Superintendent

JUST as truly as there is "the man with the hoe," there are men who have missions, and one of these is Egbert Rinehart, whose mission has been Sunday School work. For half a century he has been engaged in earnest, whole-hearted effort in this direction and his success has been so marked that there is great satisfaction in looking back over it.

Mr. Rinehart was born at High Falls, Ulster County, New York, May 29, 1833.

EGBERT RINEHART

and was early drawn toward the Sabbath School. At the age of thirteen, he acted as librarian for a school in Kingston, N. Y. The greater part of his life work (beginning in 1850), has been in New York City, where he became connected with the Eighteenth Street M. E. Church. For a short time he was a teacher in the Sunday School, but was soon chosen assistant superintendent. On the resignation of Judge Wandell, the superintendent, Mr. Rinehart was elected superintendent and held the office for eighteen consecutive years. He then became superintendent of the Sabbath School of the Twenty-fourth Street M. E. Church, and by his efforts the school became powerful for good in that portion of the city. Eighteen more years were spent in this position and then he returned, after earnest solicitation, to the Eighteenth Street Sunday School, where he labored as superintendent two years longer. He was also actively engaged in Chinese mission work.

Mr. Rinehart sought to bring into his school the outcast children of the tenements. With his co-workers he made house to house canvass, and many of the little unkempt waifs, who responded to his kind invitation to attend Sabbath School, were in a condition that might cause an ordinary Christian teacher to ask to be excused from personal contact with them; but Mr. Rinehart's love for little ones was so deep and earnest that he did not shrink from dirt and rags, but with his own hands transformed them to clean and bright looking human beings.

About eleven years ago he moved from New York City to Sea Cliff and there found a new field for his chosen work, ready for him. Mr. John T. Pirie, having resigned as superintendent of the M. E. Sunday School of that place, Mr. Rinehart was unanimously chosen, and he has held the office continuously ever since. He was one of the founders of the Sea Cliff Grove and Metropolitan Camp Ground Association. He is always laboring to keep the Sunday School in a live and growing condition. Every lesson he carefully illustrates with artistic skill upon the blackboard, and his original methods awaken and rivet the attention of teacher and scholar. He is ably seconded in his work by his wife, who is the assistant superintendent of the school. The fiftieth anniversary of his work as a Sabbath School superintendent was fitly celebrated at the Sea Cliff M. E. Church, Sunday morning, Jan. 21st.

COLD WEATHER DANGERS.

Cheering Words of Hope for Those Who Are Anxious About Their Health.

MRS. L. E. GREGORY, Ito, Miss.,
after suffering for two years, was cured by the new Slocum treatment. She says:

"For several years I suffered from weak lungs and bronchitis. About two years ago my system became weak and I found myself going into a rapid decline. The pains around my heart also increased and my stomach failed to digest food. Two doctors could not relieve me and I rapidly grew worse, with constant exhaustion from night sweats. I accidentally heard of the new discoveries of Dr. Slocum for curing consumption and pulmonary diseases, and sent to him for a full course of treatment, and after taking about half of it I began to get well. I gained weight and soon attained my normal health. I am only too happy to praise this great treatment to those who suffer as I did."

SCIENCE to the RESCUE!

Since the new discoveries of Dr. T. A. Slocum, consumption and all diseases of the head, throat and lungs have been mastered and relieved in thousands of hopeless cases. Every state pours forth its grateful testimony in praise of the famous Slocum System of Treatment.

The consumptive microbes have been mastered at last—killed and driven from the system by modern methods.

The Dr. Slocum Treatment treats by scientific progress. It first destroys the bacilli found in the lungs and tissues; then follows the healing of the mucous linings, the arrest of the abnormal breaking down of those tissues, and the toning up of the whole system.

More than that, the Treatment builds healthy flesh and fortifies against future attacks.

Four separate preparations comprise the Slocum Treatment, and when used together they quickly relieve

Coughs, Colds, Catarrh, Grip and Its After Effects, Bronchitis, Tuberculosis, Wasting Away and all Pulmonary Diseases

If you suffer from a cold, cough or other trouble which leads to consumption, write Dr. Slocum at once.

FREE MEDICINE TO READERS

Dr. Slocum will send, FREE, his NEW Treatment, consisting of the Four Preparations, The Slocum System, to all who write.

Simply address your letters to Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine Street, New York City, giving Post Office and express address, and stating that you read this in The Christian Herald.

Masterpieces of American Art

THE AMERICAN ART PUBLISHING CO. recently succeeded in making arrangements with AMERICA'S GREATEST ARTISTS for the reproduction of their MASTERPIECES in the finest photogravure process.

These photogravures represent paintings that have been sold for thousands of dollars and others that are fresh from the artists' brush.

These reproductions would sell rapidly at any art store at $5.00 each, but they cannot be purchased except directly from us, as we absolutely control the copyrights.

BEAUTIFY YOUR HOME

You have read about many of these paintings and the enormous prices paid for them, but, doubtless, never even dreamed that you could obtain a perfect facsimile in elegant form and at a nominal price to adorn your parlor or drawing-room.

These photogravures are printed from the finest plates that modern workmanship can produce, on extra heavy paper, made expressly for this work, size 18 x 24 inches. Twenty-five of them are placed in a beautiful Portfolio, and so arranged that they can be conveniently removed for framing without injury to either the picture or Portfolio.

The master-pieces of twenty-five of America's Greatest Artists are now for the first time available in a single collection.

AN ART EDUCATOR

This Portfolio, besides being a beautiful ornament to any home, is also an Art Educator and will at once stimulate a desire for the artistic.

Accompanying each picture is given a description of the painting, also a portrait and biographical sketch of the artist, an interesting account of his early studies, how he was led to take up art as a profession, in what schools and under what masters he received his instruction. It describes his trips and sojourns abroad, where and when his paintings were first exhibited and the honors they received both in Europe and America. The titles of the artist's most notable paintings are also given and where they now are. All of this information is not only interesting but exceedingly instructive.

Our Special Proposition

To all who make application this month, the price will be less than one-third the regular price and on very easy monthly payments. The Portfolio will be sent on examination with the privilege of returning if not entirely satisfactory.

10. Is it right to take for religious purposes the money of a thief or a murderer or a trust, paid to the lawyer for striving to defeat the ends of justice?

Questions of the Week

1. Which affords the greatest pleasures, memory, imagination or hope?

Hope. Memories of the past, however bright, have often a tinge of sadness about them. Imagination now and again builds glittering scenes that charm while they last, but which do not last long. Hope has a wide scope, a more solid foundation, and embraces heaven as well as earth, all eternity as well as all time. L. T. MARSHALL.

2. How may one know that he has had a personal and saving application of the blood of Christ?

By faith in the Word of God, which tells us that if we confess our sins God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. It is the blood of Christ that effects that cleansing. By faith we believe and believing have. Moreover, he that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself, for the Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit that we are the children of God. See I. John 1: 9; 7: 10; Romans 8: 16. The joy of assurance will follow honest hearty confession and simple earnest faith.

E. S. GROSVENOR.

3. What, in brief terms, constitutes a truly Christian life?

The true Christian life is one lived "by the faith of the Son of God," Gal. 2: 20. Its characteristics are humility, Luke 15: 19; Gratitude, I. Cor. 15: 10, 57; Self-denial, II. Tim. 2: 3, 4; Unselfishness, Rom. 25: 1; Charity, Matt. 22: 39; Trust in God, I. Peter 5: 7; Consecration, Acts 9: 6; Obedience, Acts 26: 19. The ruling motive is love to God in Christ, of which these are the natural and necessary external manifestations. JOHN G. OSBORNE.

4. Who were the first recorded conquerors of Chaldea—the Elamites or the Medes?

In the year 2286 B. C., a king of Elam, Kudur-Nakhunta by name, overran Chaldea, took all the cities founded by Sargon and his successors, and bore off to his capital the statues of the Chaldean gods from the temples. He then set up in Chaldea what was known as the Elamite Dynasty. In the year 538 B. C. (1,748 years later), the Medes, under their king, Cyrus, attacked and defeated the Chaldeans. SALLIE G. GRAVATT.

5. What did Christ mean when, after Peter's confession of his Lord, he said, "Upon this rock will I build my church"? Who and what is the Rock?

The rock is Christ. The Greek is plainer than the English. Christ said, "Thou art Petros (Peter, a stone), and upon this petra (rock) I will build my church." The petros is not the petra. I. Cor. 3: 11, "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." I. Cor. 10: 4, "Christ the rock." Peter himself understood that he was not the rock (I. Peter 2: 4, 5), where he likens believers to "living stones," who, "coming to" Christ the "living stone," "are built up a spiritual house," in contrast to Israel's material house. R. L. DOWNEY.

The above answer will satisfy the minds of many, but others will urge that the truth declared by Peter is the Church's foundation.

6. What is the origin of the English alphabet?

To the Phœnicians, a Semitic race who inhabited a barren strip of land on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean (1000 B. C.) we are said to owe the alphabet, which came to us with some modifications through the Greeks and the Romans. According to general belief, the Phœnicians selected from the Egyptian hieratic twenty two letters, making each represent a definite articulation. Twelve of these we retain with nearly their Phœnician value. But the age and origin of the alphabet are still under discussion. Mr. Petrie says that the inscribed potsherds found by him (1890) in Egypt "point to the independent existence of the Phœnician and perhaps the Greek alphabet at least 2000 B. C.," while Prof. Sayce, speaking of discoveries (1890) in Arabia, remarks: "Instead of seeking in Phœnicia, the primitive home of our alphabet, we may have to look for it in Arabia."

7. Does the Bible tell us what period of time the building of the ark occupied? If so, where?

The Bible nowhere tells us how long a period of time the building of the ark occupied. It does tells us how many years of probation were given to the antediluvians. The Lord said, "My spirit shall not always strive with man, for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years." Thus God gave mankind space to repent. The building of the ark may or may not have occupied the whole period. Many good Bible scholars believe that it did.

L. D. HARRINGTON.

8. From what language is the word Christ derived?

From the Greek word "chrio," which means to anoint. The verbal adjective is "christos," meaning anointed. In New Testament use it is generally prefixed with the article "the," hence "The Anointed One" or "The Christ." "Peter answereth and saith unto him, thou art the Christ" (Mark 8: 29). The corresponding Hebrew word is Messiah. "We have found the Messiah, which is being interpreted, Christ" (John 1: 41 R. V.) (Compare Ps. 2: 2 and marginal readings.) J. W. COUNTERMINE.

9. What is the origin of the term "Hobson's choice"?

According to a story told in the Spectator, a literary journal published in England in 1711, by Joseph Addison and Richard Steele, "Hobson's choice" is a phrase which owes its origin to a man named Tobias Hobson, who was the first person in England who kept a livery stable. He owned forty horses and politely offered his customers their choice, but always managed to give the traveler the horse nearest the door. "Hobson's choice" thus means an apparent choice only.

10. Is a Christian woman justified in purchasing goods that cannot be produced at the price paid except by underpayment of the labor required?

No. To make a practice of so doing is to violate the golden rule and to ignore the principle laid down by Christ that the laborer is worthy of his hire. The occasional refusal of one woman to purchase goods, the labor upon which has been underpaid, may not materially affect the situation, but the principle is wrong and were the refusal many times repeated by Christian women in combination many a now underpaid toiler would receive better remuneration. T. E. WISE.

Miscellaneous Questions

S., Plainfield, N. J. Is it right and proper for a professed follower of Christ to buy and sell coupons in endless chain propositions, which entitle the seller to a handsome silk waist for twenty-five cents; a twenty-five dollar suit for two and a half; a gold watch for one dollar; or a fountain pen for ten cents? Investigation shows that parties or firms operating the schemes receive full value for all goods distributed, and coupons of such series as do not fill are valueless.

It is a mild species of gambling, which seems to attract a credulous class who believe something is to be had for next to nothing. By the sensible and self-respecting portion of society such schemes are usually ignored. The "endless chain," except possibly when used on rare occasions for an object which justifies the expedient, is an impertinence and is usually treated as such.

Frederick F., Hettick, Ill. 1. Can a Christian justify the killing of men because rulers, whether wicked, unjust or ambitious, have declared war? 2. Is any war justifiable, save when waged in defense of life and liberty?

No, to both questions. Indeed, it is not clear that war, under any circumstances, is defensible from a thoroughly Christian standpoint; wars of aggression least of all. And the time will yet come when men, having no cause of strife with each other, will refuse to wound and slay one another at the behest of wicked kings and rulers.

W. H. H., Yorkville, S. C. Last night two Mormon elders called at my house and wanted to stay all night. I suspected from their manner and dress that they were Mormons. I refused to entertain them and they commenced quoting what Paul said in regard to entertaining strangers. I never turn any decent looking people away. Am I right so far as a Christian spirit is concerned, in refusing to take those two Mormons in?

If you had good reason for believing that they were Mormons, you did right to deny them admittance. If, however, there was a reasonable doubt about it, you should have given them the benefit of the doubt and entertained them.

John C., Payne's Creek, Cal. How much does it cost to keep a child at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home? I should like to pay for one's keeping during next summer, if I can.

Each child stays at the Home for ten days, the total expense, including street car and steamboat fares both ways, medical examination, food, shelter and attendance, being $3 a child. The Home is open ten weeks, during which over 2,000 tenement children are received and entertained, each child staying ten days. $21 will give seven little waifs a holiday of ten days each, covering the entire period during which the Home is open.

G. A. S., O. I have taken in washing to get this contribution to India which I am now sending, and as the Lord gives me strength, I will earn and send more. Is it wrong for me to do the work without my husband's knowledge (he is so opposed to my working for others), so long as it is for the cause of Christ? I never deceive him in any way only in this. He is not a Christian, and he takes no interest in foreign mission work, although charitable and tender-hearted. But this is my work and the Lord's money. I save every bit and spend none of it for myself.

We do not think you need to make it a secret from your husband. You had the right to do what you did to earn a gift for those little sufferers in India, and your self-sacrifice, be assured, will not go for nothing. It very likely will be the means of saving some poor creature's life. Such gifts as yours are consecrated ones and bring a blessing on the giver and the home from which they are sent.

This, from a reader in New Jersey, is a letter of gracious encouragement:

Dear Editor:—I want to tell what your paper has done for me. One Saturday night, fourteen years ago, I entered a book store to get a book for my Sunday's reading. Seeing THE CHRISTIAN HERALD upon the counter I looked it over and was attracted by the illustrations to read the headlines of each article. I purchased it, and without stopping longer for a book, hurried home, and before twelve o'clock that night I realized how great a sinner I was. I read and re-read it again the next day, and awaited anxiously for the next issue, which I procured as soon as published. In less than two weeks I was searching God's Word for "the pearl of great price," which I found. Praise the Lord!

I have made every effort to place THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the hands of unsaved people ever since. I have never missed a single issue in all those years, buying it from the news' stands until within the last four years, when I subscribed for it in my daughter's name. I would live upon one meal a day, if necessary, to get it.

God bless the proprietor, editor, and all those that labor to make it what it is. MRS. L. S.

A person who has no faith whatever in the Bible is not a Christian, but there are many Christians who find difficulties in the Bible which they are unable to solve.

J. R. D., Knoxville, Tenn. Is it wise for a community to bond itself or to keep clear of debt?

A community does wisely to bond itself for the securing of necessary public improvements when it cannot defray the expense from its treasury, provided that the interest and principal of its bonds can be met without crippling the people.

S. B. R., Marion City, Ia. A wave of gambling is going over our country. In the church parlors of to-day cards are brought as the pastime, and for the best player valuable prizes are waiting. The prizes have grown a little tame, and now in many of our large cities they play for money. As a rule the pulpit and press are silent. What of the night? Who are the watchmen, and who will cry? The silent ones will be held guilty.

While it is undeniable that card-playing by church members is winked at in many quarters, let us hope it is by no means as common as S. B. R. supposes. Any pastor encouraging or tolerating card-playing among the members of his church, deliberately puts up a barrier to spiritual advancement, and places a stumbling-block in the path of many, which tolerably sure to painfully if not disastrous influence some poor weak souls. There a enough innocent and elevating enjoymen available to all, so that no excuse can urged for the selection of an amusement fraught with peril and which has brought ru to countless multitudes.

Planting the Standard of the Cross in Micronesia

How the Missionaries of the American Board have Toiled for Christ in the Islands of the South Pacific

THE FIRST CHURCH ON MARSHALL ISLANDS REV. F. M. AND MRS. PRICE PUPILS IN MARSHALL ISLANDS TRAINING SCHOOL

ONE of the indirect results of the war with Spain was our acquisition of the island of Guam, one of the Ladrone group, in the South Pacific. This new territory, now under the rule of the United States, brings to the Christian people of this country ew responsibilities, for the dis-harge of which God in his rovidence has made strange nd deeply interesting prepara-ons. Guam is only six hundred iles from Ruk, where Ameri-an missionaries have won some the most remarkable triumphs Christian effort. In the an-ls of the Christian church here is no record more aston-hing than the change which as been wrought in the archi-elago of which the island of uk is a part, and that change as been accomplished in less han fifty years. Half a century go there was no region more ompletely given up to the abom-nations of heathenism than the Micronesian Islands. The deg-adation of the people was hor-ible, and wars, which raged lmost continuously, were pro-uctive of horrors indescribable. To-day peace reigns, churches ave been built on many of the slands, marriage is a recognized stitution, and the people are ager for the blessings of civili-ation for themselves, and a re-gious education for their chil-ren.

It was in the year 1852 that hree American missionaries—. H. Gulick, A. A. Sturges nd B. G. Snow, with their wives and wo Hawaiian Christian helpers, first anded in Micronesia. They settled on Ponape and Kusaie, two islands of the Caroline group. The situation was most liscouraging. The degradation of the people had been intensified by contact with white sailors in the trading vessels which had visited the islands. Drunken-ness and vice were rampant and the ignor-ance of the people was of the densest kind. For five long years the mission-aries labored, trying to win the good will of the people, learning their language and seeking to gain an influence over them. Time and again the effort seemed on the verge of failure. The lives of the mis-sionaries were in constant peril, for there was no assurance that in some drunken orgie, the friendliest of the natives might not join the opposition and massacre the little party of whites. But the faith of those noble men and women never failed. The disgusting scenes they witnessed only filled them with a stronger desire to re-deem the degraded people from their sins. They refused to be driven away and in 1859 three more missionaries: G. Pierson, E. T. Doane and H. Bingham, with their wives went to their help. Dur-ing the next five years the fruits of the self-denying toil began to appear. Set-tlements were made in three of the groups of islands: the Marshall, the Caroline and the Gilbert groups and shortly after the end of the period, the missionaries, counting their converts on all the islands, found that no less than 667 persons had become Christians.

KING'S HOUSE AT EBON (KING SEATED IN CHAIR)

During the past twenty years the work of the missionaries has been wonderfully successful. Among the consecrated men and women who have labored in Micro-nesia during that period have been Rev. and Mrs. Robert W. Logan, Rev. Fran-cis M. Price, Rev. H. J. Taylor, Rev. F. E. Rand, Rev. Alfred C. Walkup and Misses Annie E. Abell, Ida C. Foss and Louise E. Wilson. The American Board has now in the Gilbert, Marshall and Caro-line groups fifty churches, 164 places of regular preaching, 5,080 regular communicants, Sunday Schools with 6,548 pupils, three training schools with 114 students, 114 common schools in which there are 5,386 pupils and three board-ing schools for girls with sev-enty-eight pupils. When we remember, however, that the Caroline Islands alone have a population of 40,000, and that the islands to the west of Ruk have not yet heard the Gospel, we realize that as yet the work is only at the beginning. But what a glorious beginning it has been!

The labors of the brave pio-neers have been so devoted and the blessing of God upon them has been so manifest, that we should be recreant to our duty if we failed now to extend the sphere that has already been occupied. The islands evangel-ized number more than 200, but these are only a minority of the vast archipelago. Rev. Francis M. Price, to whom we are in-debted for these facts, is now in this country pleading for help to enlarge the work. He is anxious to organize missions in Guam and in Yap, and urges that funds be given to commence the work in those two islands.

The people who have listened to American missionaries will look to see what America will do for the people who have become her own. It is therefore strong ground that Dr. Price occupies when he pleads for the money which is needed to evangelize the islands not yet reached, and especially the island of Guam over which our beloved flag now waves.

.. Spiritualism ..

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Samuel 28: 7:

Behold, there is a woman that hath a familiar spirit at En-dor. And Saul disguised himself and put on other raiment, and he went, and two men with him, and they came to the woman by night.

TROUBLE to the right of him, and trouble to the left of him, Saul knew not what to do. As a last resort, he concluded to seek out a spiritual medium, or a witch, or anything that you please to call her—a woman who had communication with the spirits of the eternal world. It was a very difficult thing to do, for Saul had either slain all the witches, or compelled them to stop business. A servant one day said to King Saul, "I know of a spiritual medium down at the village of En-dor." "Do you?" said the king. Night falls. Saul, putting off his kingly robes, and putting on the dress of a plain citizen, with two servants, goes out to hunt up this medium.

Saul and his servants after a while reached the village, and they say, "I wonder if this is the house;" and they look in, and they see the haggard, weird, and shrivelled-up spiritual medium sitting by the light, and on the table sculptured images, and divining-rods, and poisonous herbs, and bottles, and vases. They say, "Yes, this must be the place." One loud rap brings the woman to the door; and as she stands there, holding the candle or lamp above her head, and peering out into the darkness, she says, "Who is here?" The tall king informs her that he has come to have his fortune told. When she hears that, she trembles, and almost drops the light, for she knows there is no chance for a fortune-teller or spiritual medium in all the land. But Saul having sworn that no harm shall come to her, she says, "Well, who shall I bring up from the dead?" Saul says, "Bring up Samuel." That was the prophet who had died a little while before. I see her waving a wand, or stirring up some poisonous herbs in a cauldron, or hear her muttering over some incantations, or stamping with her foot, as she cries out to the realm of the dead, "Samuel! Samuel!" Lo, the freezing horror! The floor of the tenement opens, and the gray hairs float up, and the forehead, the eyes, the lips, the shoulders, the arms, the feet, the entire body of the dead Samuel, wrapped in sepulchral robe, appearing to the astonished group, who stagger back, and hold fast, and catch their breath, and shiver with terror.

The dead prophet, white and awful from the tomb, begins to move his ashen lips, and he glares upon King Saul and cries out, "What did you bring me up for? What do you mean, King Saul?" Saul, trying to compose and control himself, makes this stammering and affrighted utterance, as he says to the dead prophet, "The Lord is against me, and I have come to you for help. What shall I do?" The dead prophet stretched forth his finger to King Saul and said, "Die to-morrow! Come with me into the sepulchre. I am going now. Come, come with me!" And lo! the floor again opens, and the feet of the dead prophet disappear, and the arms, and the shoulders, and the forehead. The floor closes. Oh, that was an awful seance!

We are surrounded by mystery. Before us, behind us, to the right of us, to the left of us, mystery. There is a vast realm unexplored that science, I have no doubt, will yet map out. He who explores that realm will do the world more service than did ever a Columbus or an Amerigo Vespucci. There are so many things that cannot be accounted for, so many sounds and appearances which defy acoustics and investigation, so many things approximating to the spectral, so many effects which do not seem to have a sufficient cause.

To unlatch the door between the present state and the future state all the fingers of superstition have been busy. We have books entitled Footfalls on the Boundaries of Other Worlds, The Debatable Land Between this World and the Next, Researches Into the Phenomena of Spiritualism, and whole libraries of hocus-pocus, enough to deceive the very elect. I shall not take time to rehearse the history of divination, Delphic oracle, sybil, or palmistry, or the whole centuries of imposture.

Modern Spiritualism proposes to open the door between this world and the next, and put us into communication with the dead. It has never yet offered one reasonable credential.

When I find Saul in my text consulting a familiar spirit I learn that Spiritualism is a very old religion.

Spiritualism in America was born in the year 1847, in Hydesville, Wayne County, New York, when one night there was a loud rap heard against the door of Michael Weekman; a rap a second time, a rap a third time; and all three times, when the door was opened, there was nothing found there, the knocking having been made seemingly by invisible knuckles. In that same house there was a young woman who had a cold hand passed over her face, and there being seemingly no arm attached to it, ghostly suspicions were excited.

After awhile, Mr. Fox with his family moved into that house, and then they had bangings at the door every night. One night Mr. Fox cried out, "Are you a spirit?" Two raps—answer in the affirmative. "Are you an injured spirit?" Two raps—answer in the affirmative. Then they knew right away that it was the spirit of a peddler who had been murdered in that house years before, and who had been robbed of his $500. Whether the spirit of the peddler came back to collect his $500 or his bones I do not know.

The excitement spread. There was a universal rumpus. The Hon. Judge Edmonds declared, in a book, that he had actually seen a bell start from the top shelf of a closet, heard it ring over the people that were standing in the closet; then, swung by invisible hands, it rang over the people in the back parlor; and floated through the folding doors to the front parlor, rung over the people there, and then dropped on the floor. A senator of the United States, afterwards Governor of Wisconsin, had his head quite turned with spiritualistic demonstrations. The tables tipped and the stools tilted, and the bedsteads raised, and the chairs upset, and it seemed as if the spirits everywhere had gone into the furniture business! Well, the people said: "We have got something new in this country; it is a new religion!" Oh, no, my friend, thousands of years ago we find in our text a Spiritualistic seance.

Nothing in the spiritualistic circles of our day has been more strange, mysterious and wonderful than things which have been seen in past centuries of the world. In all the ages there have been necromancers, those who consult with the spirits of the departed; charmers, those who put their subjects in a mesmeric state; sorcerers, those who by taking poisonous drugs see everything, and hear everything, and tell everything; dreamers, people who in their sleeping moments can see the future world and hold consultation with spirits. Yes, before the time of Christ the Brahmins went through all the table-moving, all the furniture excitement which the spirits have exploited in our day; precisely the same thing over and over again, under the manipulation of the Brahmins. Now do you say that spiritualism is different from these? I answer, all these delusions I have mentioned belong to the same family. They are exhumations from the unseen world.

What does God think of all these delusions? He thinks so severely of them that he never speaks of them but with livid thunders of indignation. He says: "I will be a swift witness against the sorcerer." He says: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." And lest you might make some important distinction between spiritualism and witchcraft, God says, in so many words: "There shall not be among you a consulter of familiar spirits, or wizard, or necromancer: for they that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord." The Lord God Almighty, in a score of passages, which I have not now time to quote, utters his indignation against all this great family of delusions. After that be a Spiritualist if you dare!

Still further: we learn from this text how it is that people come to fall into Spiritualism. Saul had enough trouble to kill ten men. He did not know where to go for relief. After awhile he resolved to go and see the witch of En-dor. He expected that somehow she would afford him relief. It was his trouble drove him there. And I have to tell you now that Spiritualism finds its victims in the troubled, the bankrupt, the sick, the bereft. You lose your watch, and you go to the fortune-teller to find where it is.

You lose a friend; you want the spiritual world opened, so that you may have communication with him. In a highly wrought nervous and diseased state of mind, you go and put yourself in that communication. That is why I hate Spiritualism. It takes advantage of one in a moment of weakness, which may come upon us at any time. We lose a friend. The trial is keen, sharp, suffocating, almost maddening. If we could marshal a host, and storm the eternal world, and recapture our loved one, the host would soon be marshalled. The house is so lonely. The world is so dark. The separation is so insufferable. But Spiritualism says: "We will open the future world, and your loved one can come back and talk to you." Though we may not hear his voice, we may hear the rap of his hand. So, clear the table. Sit down. Put your hands on the table. Be very quiet. Five minutes gone. Ten minutes. No motion of the table. No response from the future world. Twenty minutes. Thirty minutes. Nervous excitement all the time increasing. Forty minutes. The table shivers. Two raps from the future world. The letters of the alphabet are called over. The departed friend's name is John. At the pronunciation of the letter "J," two raps. At the pronunciation of the letter "O," two raps. At the pronunciation of the letter "H," two raps. At the pronunciation of the letter "N," two raps. There you have the whole name spelled out. J-o-h-n, John. Now, the spirit being present, you say: "John, are you happy?" Two raps give an affirmative answer.

Pretty soon the hand of the medium begins to twitch and toss, and begins to write out, after paper and ink are furnished, a message from the eternal world. What is remarkable, the departed spirit, although it has been amid the illuminations of the heaven, cannot spell as well as it used to. It has lost all grammatical accuracy and cannot write as distinctly. I received a letter through a medium once. I sent it back. I said: "Just please to tell those ghosts they had better go to school and get improved in their orthography." Now, just think of spirits, that the Bible represents as enthroned in glory, coming down to crawl under the table, and break crockery, and ring tea-bells before supper is ready, and rap the window-shutter on a gusty night! What consolation in such miserable stuff as compared with the consolation of our departed friends free from toil and sin and pain are forever happy, and that we will join them, not in mysterious and half utterance which makes the hair stand on end and make cold chills creep the back, but in a reunion most blessed and happy and glorious.

And none shall murmur or misdoubt
When God's great sunrise finds us out.

I learn still farther from this subject that Spiritualism and necromancy are affairs of darkness. Why did not Saul go in the day? He was ashamed to go. Besides that, he knew that this spiritual medium, like all her successors, performed her exploits in the night. The Davenports, the Fowlers, the Foxes, the spiritual mediums of all ages, have chosen the night or a darkened room. Why? The majority of their wonders have been swindles; and deception prospers best in the night.

Some of the performances of spiritual mediums are not to be ascribed to fraud, but to some occult law that after awhile may be demonstrated. But I believe th now nine hundred and ninety-nine out every thousand achievements on the p of spiritual mediums are arrant and mitigated humbug. The mysterious letters that used to come out on the me um's arm were found to have been ma by an iron pencil that went heavily o the flesh, not tearing it, but so disturbi the blood that it came up in great rou letters. The witnesses of the seances ha locked the door, put the key in their pock arrested the operator, and found out searching the room that hidden lev moved the tables. The sealed letters t were mysteriously read without openi have been found to have been cut at t side, and then afterwards slyly put gether with gum arabic; and the medi who, with a heavy blanket over his hea could read a book, has been found to ha had a bottle of phosphoric oil, by the lig of which anybody can read a book; a ventriloquism, and legerdemain, a sleight of hand, and optical delusion count for nearly everything. Decepti being the main staple of Spiritualism, wonder it chooses the darkness!

You have all seen strange and una countable things in the night. Almo every man has at some time had a tou of hallucination. Some time ago, afte had been over-tempted to eat somethi indigestible before retiring at night, aft retiring I saw the president of one of t prominent colleges astride the foot of t bed, while he demanded of me a lo of five cents! When I awakened I h no idea it was anything supernatur And I have to advise you, if you he and see strange things at night, to st eating hot mince pie, and take a dose bilious medicine. It is an outraged ph sical organism, enough to deceive t very elect after sundown, and does near all its work in the night. The witch En-dor held her seances at night; so they all. Away with this religion spooks!

Still further: I learn from my text th Spiritualism is doom and death to i disciples. King Saul thought that h would get help from the "medium"; b the first that he sees makes him swoo away, and no sooner is he resuscitate than he is told he must die. Spiritualism doom and death to everyone that yiel to it. It ruins the body. Look in upo an audience of spiritualists. Cadave ous. Weak. Nervous. Exhausted. Hand clammy and cold. Voices sepulchral an ominous. Bewildered with raps. I neve knew a confirmed Spiritualist who had healthy nervous system. It is incipien epilepsy and catalepsy. Destroy yo nervous system and you might as well b dead. I have noticed that people wh are hearing raps from the future worl have but little strength left to bear th hard raps of this world. A man can liv with only one lung or with no eyes, an be happy, as men have been under suc afflictions; but woe be to the man whos nerves are shattered. Spiritualism smite first of all, and mightily, against the nerv ous system, and so makes life miserable.

I indict Spiritualism, also, because i is a social and marital curse. The wors deeds of licentiousness and the worst or gies of uncleanness have been enacte under its patronage. The story is to vile for me to tell. I will not pollute m tongue or your ears with the recital Sometimes the civil law has been evoke to stop the outrage. Families innumer able have been broken up by it. It ha pushed off hundreds of young wome into a life of profligacy. It talks abou "elective affinities," and "affinital rela tions," and "spiritual matches," and adopts the whole vocabulary of free-lov ism. In one of its public journals it de clares "marriage is the monster curse o civilization." "It is a source of debauchery and intemperance." If Spiritualism could have its full swing, it would turn this world into a pandemonium of car nality. It is an unclean, adulterous, damnable religion, and the sooner it drops into the hell from which it rose, the better both for earth and heaven. For the sake of man's honor and woman's purity, I say let the last vestige of it per ish forever. I wish I could gather up all the raps it has ever heard from spirits blest or damned, and gather them all on its own head in thundering raps of anni hilation!

I further indict Spiritualism for that it

The Twelve Moody's Sources of Power

By JOSEPH COOK, LL.D.

COPYRIGHT, 1900, BY LOUIS KLOPSCH

WHAT did Providence give to the world in Mr. Moody and his career as evangelist and Biblical educator?

1. A Man of Prayer, the chief secret of his wisdom, usefulness and success. Self-surrender to God as both Saviour and Lord made Mr. Moody an illuminated soul and will make any man such. He believed with his whole mind, might, heart and strength that deliverance from sin and the guilt of it through self-surrender to God as both Saviour and Lord is in the very nature of things absolutely indispensable to the peace of the soul in life and death and beyond death. His chief motive in life was to increase the number of souls redeemed and illuminated by this double self-surrender and consequent double deliverance. But such submission to God was with Mr. Moody an inseparable part of all true prayer. It has commonly been taught that prayer consists of four parts—adoration, confession, thanksgiving, petition. But to these Mr. Moody always added a fifth part, namely, total self-surrender of the soul to God as both Saviour and Lord. In his searching, short treatise on Prevailing Prayer, he makes nine parts essential to its genuineness—adoration, confession, restitution, thanksgiving, forgiveness, unity, faith, petition, submission. This is what he meant by prayer in the inquiry room. Every part of this ideal he insisted upon as a standard for the duty of the unconverted souls to whom he gave advice. Anything less than this standard requires was to Mr. Moody what the Scriptures call "vain repetition" and not prayer. If it be said that this definition of prayer is too comprehensive and severe, it must be answered that it is no more comprehensive and severe than the Lord's Prayer. No one can offer the Lord's Prayer sincerely without uttering from the inmost soul the petition, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done" in myself this instant as in heaven. This posture of the praying spirit includes all the parts of prayer already named, and means total submission to God as both Saviour and Lord. It opens the way to conversion; it is the ante-chamber to conversion; it is prevailing prayer, for it always brings that gift of the Holy Spirit, which is conversion.

> Evermore surrendered souls
> God's love crowns with aureoles.

Mr. Moody was accustomed to say that our Lord taught his disciples how to pray, but that it is not recorded that he taught them how to preach. "I would rather know how to pray like Daniel," he said, "than to preach like Gabriel. If you have love in your soul so that the grace of God may come down in answer to prayer, there will be no trouble about reaching the people" (Prevailing Prayer, page 12).

Preaching, Mr. Moody believed, was to be a condensation of prayer. All this with him meant not sentiment nor theory, but business, which he undertook as if by divine command. This faith in prayer justified itself continually in his strenuous and astonishingly effective addresses in the pulpit and in conversations and prayers in the inquiry room. He never consented to visit a city for revival services until he had secured a union of the churches for several days or weeks previously in prayer for divine blessing on the proposed evangelistic meetings. Such prayer meant the renewed self-consecration of church members to their whole duty, and their preparation to labor in the inquiry rooms with the unconverted in the spirit of prayer taken in its full and overwhelmingly practical Biblical meaning. It was through prayer in this sense that Mr. Moody reached the masses, and so set others at work as to set them also on fire.

2. A man of the Book. Unwearied in Biblical study, he wore out several Bibles and absorbed the very atmosphere as well as the spiritual texts of Scripture. Miss Willard, whose endowment of experience showed that she was able to stand before queens, used to say of her days as Mr. Moody's coadjutor in Boston: "If we ever differed in opinion on any religious question in our private conferences as to our work, I was unable to stand before him, for he was a torrent of proof texts." The sound of this torrent is heard in all Mr. Moody's best addresses. It is the supreme source of their effectiveness. His answers to the difficulties met with by inquirers were, nine times out of ten, given in Biblical language. He took his Bible into the inquiry rooms as a quiver full of arrows sure to meet every exigency. His readings from the Bible were marvels of spiritual insight. His combinations of texts almost never struck a false note, and were wonderfully suggestive of piercing in their spiritual power. The great conventions he organized at Northfield and his Bible Institute in Chicago had for their avowed and specific objects the study of Scripture in its spiritual application. This subject predominates over every other in the instruction given in the Northfield and Mt. Hermon schools. In connection with these institutions and conventions, Mr. Moody brought together some of the most authoritative experts in Bible study from both sides the sea. As a man of the Book, with such aids and environment, though he himself read only English, he is to be spoken of with reverence as rightly dividing the Word of Truth. He was a profoundly well-educated man in the spirit and substance of the Scriptures. By his example in the pulpit and inquiry rooms, and by the schools which he founded, he became not only a great evangelist by the Divine blessing on the Holy Word, but also a great Biblical educator.

3. A man of soundest evangelical faith— with a mighty grasp of essentials in the answer to the question, "What must I do to be saved?" When Mr. Moody began his work as an evangelist, that of President Finney was in course of culmination. The autobiography of this greatest of American evangelists between Jonathan Edwards and Whitefield on the one hand and Mr. Moody on the other, and also his "Lectures on Revivals" show the condition of the spiritual atmosphere pervading the best part of the Congregational and other evangelical churches just before the Civil War. This atmosphere was a breath which we now have a right to say as we judge it by its fruits through half a century must have been sent forth from a Divine source. Many theological teachers, whose names are now held in high reverence by the churches, were then at the height of their power. President Finney himself was a theologian as well as an evangelist, and one of the founders of Oberlin College; but among the eminent teachers of the time were Charles Hodge, Henry B. Smith, Professor Edwards A. Park, Professor Shedd, Austin Phelps and Professor N. W. Taylor. Among evangelists, Nettleton and Lyman Beecher were in the afterglow of their careers. Mr. Spurgeon, who all his life by his sermons was one of Mr. Moody's most effective teachers, was beginning his extraordinary work in London. Dr. E. N. Kirk, in the Mt. Vernon Church—which Mr. Moody first attended when he came to Boston as a youth of seventeen—was himself an evangelist of remarkable power. His church stood in Boston for the defense of sound evangelical theology and evangelistic methods. Mr. Moody was the child of this great hour in American religious history. With the whole force of his straightforward loyalty to supreme essentials in religious faith and work, he grasped the sound teaching of his time and environment. He believed with his whole heart in the necessity of the New Birth and the atonement, and in the divine authority of the Holy Scriptures in religious things. His conversion was a searchingly sound one. It was natural with his native endowments that he should thereafter become a spiritual force to be reckoned with in our religiously somnolent and inert day and generation. He had convictions, and it was a moral necessity with him to transmute them into action.

4. A man of extraordinary practical sagacity, organizing power, business and executive talent and aptness for leadership. He used to say that it was better to set ten men at work than to do yourself the work of ten men. But he was accustomed to do both. In the management of large evangelistic enterprises he was worth any ten ordinary committees. He never failed to make use of all the usual and of some novel but legitimate means necessary to bring together and hold great audiences and to fill places of prayer, scattered over a whole city or district and especially his own inquiry rooms, with Christian workers equipped for personal dealing with the unconverted. Without arrogance or offensively dictatorial spirit, he had natural power of command through his common sense, decision and palpably unselfish motives. He was a born spiritual charioteer. He could drive more religious steeds abreast than any evangelist of his time or, perhaps, than any known to history. The captain of a fire brigade is wisely and necessarily autocratic at times, and must be so to meet the exigencies of his position, and would be derelict in duty were he not masterful in executing the laws, well understood as authoritative, in the work of extinguishing a conflagration. But that he was autocratic in this good sense of the word, and only in this was Mr. Moody's merit. He, too, was captain of a fire brigade engaged in extinguishing a conflagration, and is not to be blamed because he exhibited a decision which justified itself by its results.

5. A man of unquestionable unselfishness, never dominated by the love of money and, indeed, caring little for it except for benevolent purposes. No taint of the passion for filthy lucre can be found in his record. His style of living was simple and unostentatious. His provision for his own family during his life and his legacies for them at his death were in the form of work rather than wealth, although he might easily and rightfully have been a fairly rich man. As Dr. Pentecost has said: "He was not a lover of money" (The Independent, Jan. 4, page 13).

6. A man of extraordinary philanthropy for the purposes of Biblical education and evangelistic work. It is estimated that the royalties on the Moody and Sankey hymn books amounted to three million dollars. All this was transferred to a committee, of which John Wanamaker was chairman. It was sacredly devoted to the interests of Mr. Moody's schools at Northfield and of his Biblical Institute in Chicago. Professor George Adam Smith calls this use of Mr. Moody's income, very justly, one of the finest philanthropies of the century. He was wonderfully effective as a collector of funds. It is estimated that six millions passed through his hands (Dr. Foster, in the Advance, Jan. 13). It is certain that none of it was wasted and that none of it stuck to his own fingers.

7. A man of combined courage and tenderness— bold as any lion, tender as any drop of dew. This double character was in his bearing, his voice, his eyes. He was only five feet and eight inches in height and wore a number seven hat, but he had the shoulders of an athlete and weighed two hundred and seventy pounds. Sitting on a platform and seeing other men stand up with him, I have often thought that the scene should be photographed from the rear, for no one had shoulders approaching Mr. Moody's in effective, lionlike breadth and depth. "I wish I had your shoulders," said Mr. Gladstone on first meeting him in London. "I wish I had your head on them," said Mr. Moody in answer. In Mr. Moody's face and tones and eyes, however, besides the high qualities of valor and indomitableness, there was at times so much suppressed tenderness that the total effect of his personality was like that of a morning breeze under a June sky. His tendency was to conceal his emotions, but it required no great shrewdness to see through the veils of his manly reticence.

8. A man endowed by his unusually powerful but balanced emotions with greatness of character, and by his cautious and trenchant common sense with strategic strength of mind. "I wonder," said a young minister to Professor Park, "that Providence can accomplish so much through a man of only moderate endowments." This was in 1875 in Boston. "I wish to speak respectfully of Providence," said Professor Park in reply, "but I call Mr. Moody a great man." And in 1900 Professor Park writes deliberately: "Mr. Moody was more than a remarkable man. He was a prodigy."

9. A Man of quiet, but very painstaking preparation for whatever he undertook whether exposition of Scripture, exhortation from the pulpit, personal dealing with those whom he met in his inquiry rooms, employment of associates, organization of meetings or the planning and execution of evangelistic campaigns. He never used notes on the platform. His Bible, however, had abundant manuscript annotations, of which he made the most skilful use. Once at Cleveland, Ohio, in his room at the Forest City House, I saw a large square table in the centre of his chamber completely covered with documents—envelopes containing collections of notes for his sermons and piled up to a depth of four to six inches over the whole space. Professor George Adam Smith says (Outlook, Jan. 20, 1900) that Mr. Moody twice came to England to listen to various preachers and make a study of the religious situation, as it were incognito, before he and Mr. Sankey made their first great evangelistic tour there in 1873.

10. A man whose preaching always addressed the will and all whose methods, as an evangelist, were intended to secure decision in the inquirer to accept God in Christ as both Saviour and Lord. Mr. Moody preached to the emotions and to the understanding, indeed, but his supreme object in the pulpit, in the inquiry rooms and in all the expressions he asked from audiences was to reach the will and persuade men to immediate decision to do their whole duty. He did not neglect the power of sacred song, nor of Scriptural instruction, nor of the reproof of sin, public and private, but he called first, midst and last for the instantaneous decision of his hearers to choose Christ as Redeemer and Ruler.

11. A man working easily with associates, whose endowments filled out his own, like Professor Drummond and Mr. Sankey, the three together making a globe of capacities and aptitudes for the work they undertook. Mr. Moody's methods with his associates were those of spiritual manliness everywhere commanding confidence. His experience had shown him his own powers and also his limitations. He undoubtedly underrated himself as preacher when he said, "I have no capacity for pulpit work beyond the ordinary. I do not easily reach lawyers, doctors, teachers, editors." His most remarkable power was perhaps in the personal dealing with his hearers in the inquiry rooms, with the open Scriptures and prayer as his divine weapons. But he appreciated most keenly styles of preaching entirely different from his own. He had a passionate respect for eminent spiritual power connected with high intellectual endowments. He reverenced sound learning in all its forms and had too humble an opinion of himself as a self-educated man.

His training, at the first in the mission work he founded in Chicago and afterwards in his career as chaplain in the army, taught him to address the individual face to face, and an audience as an assembly of individuals, to each one of whom he had a personal message. His style was adapted to the average man, and carried home his thought with extraordinary facility and force. He was certainly one of the greatest popular preachers who ever lived, although he has left little in print that will compare with the discourses of Edwards, Whitefield and Finney, with whom, as a preacher, he would not for an instant have compared himself. But I venture the assertion that no one of these evangelists had greater power over the average hearer in the inquiry room through Biblical citations and prayer than Mr. Moody, or, indeed, could flash more thought upon an audience through a single phrase than he sometimes did in his best moments in the pulpit.

As to his intercourse with his associates, it produced profound personal attachment on the part of the strongest of them and an enthusiastic loyalty in the mass of them who saw him in all his ways. He did not, indeed, wear his heart always upon his sleeve. He had much reticence, but no cunning or misleading evasiveness. His reticence was a shield against eccentrics and weaklings and unauthorized questioners from whom he kept himself remarkably free. As a whole, his character was a combination of caution and courage, decision and tenderness, reticence and straightforwardness, moderate self-appreciation and immense personal efficiency, trust in himself but supreme trust only in God's Word and the Holy Spirit.

12. A man whose career has been a spiritual link between England and America, and all English-speaking lands. He should have gone to India and Australia in whose largest cities he would have been received as he was in England and America, and have done a work immensely needed on the other side of the globe. But his books went into these regions and his name, throughout Christendom, was a household word. The Roman Catholics reverenced his career. Unevangelical denominations, with whom he formed no alliance, recognized his spiritual power. The number of those who mourn over his grave can be estimated only by him whose eyes wander to and fro through the whole earth. His wonderful last moments in which he seemed to have a vision of the opening gates of the celestial city, will be among the most sacred memories enriching the hearts of the faithful. His biography, if wisely written, will contain precious treasures of spiritual inspiration for centuries to come. In the last passage which he ever edited for the press, he chose for the New Year's Day of 1900 these memorable watch words (Record of Christian Work, Jan. 1900, page 24):

> Fear, facing the New Year,
> Thinketh, "What shall it bring?"
> And is dumb,
> Dreading the hidden ways.
> Faith, looking upward, saith,
> "God is in everything.
> Let it come;
> God ordereth the days."
> This is our New Year's bliss,
> He is mine and I am His.
> All the days,
> All the ways,
> Lead us home;
> Let us pray, let us praise.

Native Korean Evangelists

Philip S. Yib, formerly a student at Harley College, London, England, and latterly in the United States, has returned to Seoul, Korea. He has chosen to be an evangelist among his own people. He writes, speaking of much fruit in his work and of nine in his family being converted. David B. Yer, also a former student at Harley College, is arranging to open in Korea a college for young men who desire Christian teaching. Many of the noble class in Korea are earnestly desiring such teaching, and some come over to America to obtain it. The heart desire of these Christian Korean students is to win souls to Christ.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon

is a cause of insanity. There is not an asylum between Bangor and San Francisco which has not the torn and bleeding victims of this delusion. Go into any asylum, I care not where it is, and the presiding doctor, after you have asked him, "What is the matter with that man?" will say: "Spiritualism demented him"; or, "What is the matter with that woman?" he will say, "Spiritualism demented her." It has taken down some of the brightest intellects. It swept off into mental midnight judges, senators, governors, ministers of the Gospel, and one time came near capturing one of the Presidents of the United States. At Flushing, L. I., a man became absorbed with it, forsook his family, took his only fifteen thousand dollars, surrendered them to a spiritual medium in New York, attempted three times to put an end to his own life, and then was incarcerated in the State Lunatic Asylum. Many years ago the steamer Atlantic started from Europe for the United States. Getting mid-ocean, the machinery broke, and she floundered around day after day, and week after week; and for a whole month after she was due people wondered, and finally gave her up. There was great anguish in the cities, for there were many who had friends aboard that vessel. Some of the women, in their distress, went to the spiritual medium, and inquired as to the fate of that vessel. The medium called up the spirits, and the rappings on the table indicated the steamship lost, with all on board. Women went raving mad, and were carried to the lunatic asylum. After awhile one day a gun was heard off Quarantine. The flags went up on the shipping, and the bells of the churches were rung. The boys ran through the streets, crying: "Extra! The Atlantic is safe!" There was the embracing as from the dead, when friends came again to friends; but some of those passengers went up to find their wives in the lunatic asylum, where this cheat of infernal Spiritualism had put them.
